Philanthropist believed in Holocaust education

The Toronto Jewish community is mourning the loss of Chaim Neuberger, a builder, philanthropist and Holocaust survivor who died at the age of 82 on Erev Yom Kippur.

At his Sept. 27 funeral at Beth Tzedec Congregation, family and friends gathered to pay respects to a man who will not be forgotten by the community.

Before Neuberger's two daughters, Myra York and Edie Neuberger, and grandson Adam Jesin delivered their moving eulogies, Beth Tzedec spiritual leader, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spoke about the circumstances that brought Neuberger to Toronto.

Neuberger was born in 1930 in a small Polish town into a family of six children.

The youngest of his siblings, Neuberger was a child when World War II broke out.

"Chaim witnessed or learned about the murder of his entire family," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

Neuberger survived due to the heroic actions of a Christian family who hid him and nine other Jewish children on their farm for nine months.

"He carried this history in his blood and his bones, but he survived," the rabbi said.

Neuberger was 15 when the war ended. He moved from Poland to Austria and then to Italy, before settling in Canada in 1948 through a government-sponsored program that brought in 80 Jewish orphans.

Neuberger thrived once he settled in Toronto, forging a career as a successful builder.

His daughter, Myra York, said she often wondered how her father, whom she described as "friendly, generous and always had a big smile on his face," could be so happy and optimistic despite his horrific history.

"His whole family was murdered, but he was the lucky one. He never forgot the generosity of the Righteous Gentiles who saved him, and he continued to communicate and help support them until the time they passed," she said.

York added that although he never spoke about his personal experience during the Holocaust, he believed that "education above all else was the only way to prevent the Holocaust from recurring."

In 2008, Neuberger donated $10 million to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to establish the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre.

"We were all very proud of him when he made the donation on behalf of my mother and himself," she said.

Adding some levity to the service, York told the story about how her father met her late mother, who died in 2002.

"At 30, his uncle told him it was time to get married. He knew of a nice heimish family up in Brooklyn that had five beautiful daughters, and he said, 'Go pick one.' So he did," she said, eliciting laughter.

"It was my mother, Sarah, who opened the door when he arrived, so he picked her.

"My mom was the true love of my dad's life... He often referred to her as his angel. When she got sick, he was the only one she would allow to take care of her, and he did it selflessly."

York said the other loves of her father's life were his two daughters and eight grandchildren, whom he would often treat to dinners and shopping trips.

Although Neuberger was widely known for his business savvy and generosity, she said few people knew how funny he was.

"He didn't tell jokes so much, rather he would make up his own language. When the phone would ring, he would answer, 'How do you doddle?'... And he would always say 'DV,' which, of course, stood for 'Don't Worry.'"

When Neuberger's eldest grandson, Adam Jesin, took to the podium, he spoke about how close they were, and fondly recalled the times they spent together on vacation in Florida.

Jesin said his grandfather was a survivor in every sense of the word.

"He lost his entire family, so he made it his mission in life to create a family and legacy of his own."

He added that his grandfather was a generous man who "wanted only for his family to be taken care of and provided for, and he ensured that they always were."

Neuberger's daughter, Edie, thanked the people who had enriched the quality of her father's life.

"My father experienced the most unspeakable acts of depravity as a 15-year-old child... He also experienced undeniable acts of kindness," she began.

She thanked the Righteous Gentiles who kept him safe for months – despite the danger to their own family for doing so – and the Canadian government who opened its doors in 1948 to orphaned Holocaust survivors.

She thanked her late mother twice – once for "marrying him, giving him a new family, a new mother, a new father, brothers and sisters... [who] thought of him as a brother," and a second time for "giving him children and a Jewish home."

She thanked her own children and her sister's children for giving him "absolute joy."

She also thanked her father's caregiver, Emelia, whom she called an "angel from heaven" who took care of her father for five years "without ever a complaint."

Last, she thanked her father for being "kind and generous and loving."

Shaare Zedek cantor emeritus dies at 91

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Cantor Mendel Fogel was remembered for his unreserved kindness, patience, warmth, as well as for his complete devotion to Judaism and his beloved Shaare Zedek Congregation following his death Sept. 22 at age 91.

A Holocaust survivor, Fogel was the Conservative congregation's first permanent cantor in 1954, and he continued to serve there even after his official "retirement" 38 years later in 1992, when he became cantor "emeritus," an affiliation lasting a total of 58 years.

Funeral services took place at the Notre-Dame-de-Grâce synagogue that was Fogel's home away from home for all those years.

Fogel — the father of Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs — trained generations of bnei mitzvah, presided over countless simchahs and life-cycle events, and was always there when needed, friends and admirers said in condolence messages posted on the Paperman and Sons website.

"He was an inspiration to the community and will be missed!" one of scores of admirers wrote.

Fogel played an instrumental role in the founding of the Council of Chazzanim of Greater Montreal, serving as its president from 1966 to 1969 and from 1985 to 1988.

Born the son of Samuel and Paula in the Hungarian shtetl of Tisa-Polgar in July, 1921, Fogel was conscripted into forced labour in 1942, was deported to Bergen-Belsen concentration camp in Germany 1944, and then transferred to Terezienstadt, which was liberated by the Russian army in 1945.

After spending many months in various displaced persons camps, Fogel arrived in Montreal in 1948 with siblings who had also survived the Holocaust.

Shaare Zedek honoured Fogel and his wife, Frances, following his official retirement, and honoured him again years later with a gala concert.

Fogel was also a member of the Cantors Assembly of North America, chaired its northeast region, and was designated an honorary fellow of the Cantors Institute.

After he turned 90, Fogel, in the synagogue's newsletter Reflections, thanked Rabbi Alan Bright for a special siddur that was presented to him by the congregation and for all the honours his shul had bestowed upon him up to that time.

"I hope and fervently pray for the continuation of this extraordinary close relation in the days and years ahead," he wrote a little more than a year before his death.

Fogel was predeceased by siblings Naftali, Moshe, and Miriam, and is survived by his wife of 59 years Frances (Koffler); children Paula, Shimon, and Samuel; 17 grandchildren; and six great-grandchildren.

Braising still a great option

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CIN

Somehow, along the culinary continuum, braising as a cooking method has gone somewhat out of style. Or perhaps people and foodies are simply calling it something else. Well, a rose by any other name is still a rose, and a braised dish will always be a braised dish. And rather a good thing it is too!

Braising is essentially the method by which a food, generally meat but sometimes fish or fowl, is cooked for a lengthy period of time with a small amount of liquid. Sounds a tad boring, but the result is uniquely wonderful.

Braising can take a long time, like a stew, but it can also be surprisingly brief if you're using fish or vegetables, items that adapt surprisingly well to this technique.

The recipe below showcases this adaptable technique with delicious rewards. The chicken dish is sweet without being overly so, the wine and orange juice co-mingling with the cumin and dates.

BRAISED CHICKEN WITH ORANGE JUICE AND DATES

4 whole chicken legs, cut into thighs and drumsticks

1 1/4 cup all-purpose flour
1 1/4 cup Dijon mustard
3 tbsp. olive oil
1 cup chopped onions
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 1/2 cup chopped carrots
1 tsp. each ground ginger and cinnamon
1/2 tsp. ground cumin
1 1/2 tsp. salt
3 1/4 cup dry white wine
1-1 1/2 cups chicken broth
1/2 cup orange juice
2 tbsp. tomato paste
1 bay leaf
1 1/2 lb. dates, pitted and halved lengthwise or 12 whole apricots
1 1/2 cup chopped green pepper
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
1 1/4 cup chopped fresh coriander or parsley

Preheat oven to 350. Place flour in flat dish. Brush chicken with mustard, dip into flour, shaking off excess. Heat oil in large ovenproof Dutch oven set over medium-high heat. The pan should be large enough to hold chicken pieces in one layer. Sear chicken until golden brown on both sides, remove chicken from pan and set aside.

Reduce heat to medium. Add onions, garlic and carrots to pan. Cook until onions are lightly browned, about 3 minutes. Stir in ginger, cinnamon, cumin and salt for 1 minute. Sprinkle leftover flour over onions and cook, stirring until well blended. 2 minutes. Increase heat to high and stir in wine, stirring to scrape up any browned bits from bottom of pan. Stir in chicken broth, orange juice, tomato paste and bay leaf, mixing well.

Return chicken to pan. Bring to boil. Cover, braise in centre of preheated oven for 30 minutes. Add dates or apricots. Cook for about 45 more minutes or until the meat is just starting to fall off the bone.

Using slotted spoon, remove chicken and dried fruit from pan; keep warm on plate. Skim off as much fat from sauce as possible. Stir in green pepper. Over medium-high heat, bring sauce to a boil. Reduce heat to medium-low and boil gently, stirring occasionally, until sauce is slightly thickened, 3 to 5 minutes. Stir in lemon juice. Pour sauce over warm chicken, sprinkle with chopped fresh coriander. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Hundreds clash at the Temple Mount

Yoel Goldman and Gabe Fisher
Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Following the conclusion of prayers Oct. 5 at the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, hundreds of Arabs threw stones at security guards in the area. Police charged through the Mughrabi Gate in the Old City and fired stun grenades to disperse the angry mob.

Unconfirmed Palestinian reports suggested that several people were lightly injured.

Police officials, having restored calm, said that they would arrest some of the stone-throwers in the coming days.

Rabbi of the Western Wall and the Holy Sites of Israel Shmuel Rabinovitch expressed shock following Friday's violent demonstration, assessing that it was meant to prevent Jewish worshippers from praying in the area during Sukkot. He said that it was up to the police to arrest those who "wish to harm the delicate fabric of the holy sites in the Old City, and to harass worshippers."

Rabbi Rabinovitch called on the public to continue observing the holiday at the Western Wall.

On Oct. 4, a confrontation at the Temple Mount plaza led to six arrests as a group of Muslim worshippers threatened Jewish visitors to the site.

According to a police spokesperson, about 30 Muslims began chanting "Allahu Akbar" (God is great) and tried to attack a group of Jews who were visiting the site. Police broke up the altercation, and arrested five Arabs and one Jew. The Temple Mount, holy to both Jews and Muslims, is closely monitored in order to defuse potential tensions between Muslim worshippers and Jewish and international visitors.

The plaza is under the management of the Islamic Wakf, with Israeli police responsible for security. Under Israeli rules aimed at keeping the peace at the volatile site, Jews are allowed to visit but not to worship there.

On Tuesday, Likud activist Moshe Feiglin was arrested for allegedly violating rules regarding Jewish prayer at the site.

Pro-Israel activists have diverse political views

Neil Rubin
JTA

WASHINGTON — Jewish student leaders may be strident in their Israel advocacy, but they are tolerant in defining pro-Israel activism and diverse in their political views.

Those are among the major findings of a new survey being billed as the first major study of North American young adult leaders involved in pro-Israel advocacy.

Of the 4,000 or so Israel advocates age 30 and younger who were surveyed, 87 per cent said they welcomed "multiple perspectives" on the pro-Israel spectrum. Ideologically speaking, 45 per cent self-identified as either politically liberal or slightly liberal; 30 per cent said they were conservative or slightly conservative; and 21 per cent called themselves moderate. Four per cent said they were extremely conservative and two per cent said they were extremely liberal.

The respondents came from diverse religious backgrounds, too: 37 per cent said they were Conservative Jews, 27 per cent Orthodox, 18 per cent Reform and 16 per cent "other Jewish."

The study, titled Next Generation Advocacy: A Study of Young Israel Advocates, was released last week by the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Family Foundation. It was conducted by Ezra Kopelowitz and Daniel Chesir-Teran of Research Success Technologies.

"There's a sense that young advocates come from a particular political persuasion, that they're shrill and that there's polarization," Lisa Eisen, the director of the Schusterman Foundation, told JTA. "They are very diverse, sophisticated and non-ideological, which is not something that most people would imagine."

Young North Americans in Jerusalem on the Taglit-Birthright program show their support of the Jewish state.

Divisive activists are part of the spectrum, Eisen acknowledged, but they "are way out on the margin."

Those surveyed were leaders of such organizations as Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, Hillel, iCenter, the Israel on Campus Coalition, Moishe House, The David Project, Write On For Israel, Hasbara Fellowships, MASA Israel Journey, Stand With Us and the BBYO group for teenagers.

The study also pointed to a relatively high correlation between participation in Birthright Israel, the free 10-day trip to Israel for young adults, and Israel activism. Some 26 per cent of the pro-Israel leaders surveyed were Birthright alumni.

Pro-Israel activist Samantha Vinokor, 22, said she discovered early on that there is no single profile for pro-Israel activism.

"You don't need to be religiously observant because you can connect in your own way, and you don't need to be politically aware because you can connect culturally or through food or in other ways," said Vinokor, who was active in pro-Israel groups at the University of Pittsburgh before enrolling in a master's program at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in New York and landing a job as director of communications for the World Zionist Organization.

"The pro-Israel movement can give so many different people a home," she said. "That's something that I tried to bring onto campus and that I bring to my professional life as well."

Eisen said the study debunks some myths about who pro-Israel activists are and what they believe, while also revealing some shortcomings in how pro-Israel activists are mobilized in American Jewish life.

While 85 per cent of high school seniors and 66 per cent of college seniors said they wanted to continue pro-Israel work after graduation, only 27 per cent and 33 per cent, respectively, reported being asked to do so by a Jewish organization.

"The motivation is there, the passion is there, the interest is there," Eisen said. "We just haven't fully tapped the potential."

German cabinet to rule on circumcision

ЛТА

BERLIN — Germany's cabinet has scheduled a discussion on an amendment that would formally legalize ritual circumcision but place some restrictions on who could circumcise and how.

The discussion was set for Oct. 10, the German paper Die Welt reported. To become law, the amendment needs to pass a vote in the Bundestag. Amendment 1631d to the law code on the rights of children was devised following a controversial ruling in May by a court in Cologne that said circumcision amounted to a criminal act.

In a rare show of solidarity, Jewish and Muslim groups demonstrated together recently in Berlin against what both consider an attempt to curtail religious freedom. If passed, the amendment would legalize religious circumcision of male minors when performed by a person who is medically qualified, but only with parental consent and under anesthesia. Under the amendment, mohels, or Jewish ritual circumcisers, would be able to continue perform circumcisions if they obtain the relevant medical qualification.

Dieter Graumann, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, has said in a statement that "it is especially welcome to hear that circumcision will not be regulated by criminal law but by family law." He called the amendment "a step in the right direction."

Representatives of the Green Party, the Social Democrats and the Left Party already have protested the new proposal, according to the German news agency DPA, calling it "alarming" that the protection of a child from bodily harm seems to have taken secondary importance.

Argentina's Jews reluctant to talk with Iran

Diego Melamed
ITA

BUENOS AIRES — Jewish leaders and relatives of victims of the deadly bombing of the AMIA Jewish centre in Buenos Aires are urging their government not to negotiate with Iran.

Hector Timerman, Argentina's Jewish foreign minister, met recently at U.N. headquarters in New York with his Iranian counterpart, Ali Akbar Salehi, about the July 1994 bombing on the Jewish community's main building, and the two countries said they would continue negotiations through government officials in Geneva.

Iran is accused of directing the attack, which killed 85 and injured hundreds. The Lebanon-based terror group Hezbollah allegedly carried out the attack.

"The only Iranian offering of cooperation that we accept is to submit the accused to the courts of our country, where they will enjoy guarantees and rights of defence," declared a document signed last week at the rebuilt AMIA headquarters by the relatives and Jewish leaders.

"As victims of the attack, we are not ready to endorse a new Iranian maneuver whose sole purpose is to ensure impunity for fugitives and to prevent justice."

Among those signing were Guillermo Berger, president of AMIA, Aldo Donzis, president of the DALA, the country's umbrella Jewish community group, and 21 relatives of victims of the blast.

PA accuses Israel

The Palestinian Authority (PA) over the last month has frequently accused Israel of trying to destroy Jerusalem's Al-Aqsa Mosque, the third-holiest site in Islam. Palestinian Media Watch reported five instances in September when leaders or organizations of the PA told Al-Hayat Al-Jadida, the PA's official daily publication, that Israel plans to replace Al-Aqsa with an "alleged Temple." On Sept. 20, the publication quoted Sheikh Dr. Tayseer Rajab Al-Tamimi, secretary of the Supreme Islamic Council in Jerusalem, as saying Al-Aqsa "is subject to daily invasions by settlers and extremist Jewish groups, and [subject] to attempts to desecrate [it], [all of which] are steps in implementing a Zionist plan to seize control and Judaize [the mosque], as preparation for its destruction, and for building their alleged Temple on its ruins."

Early elections?

Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin has called on the Israeli parliament to disband itself and begin preparing for early elections. "It would be best" if the Knesset passed a resolution to disband itself "within days or even hours" of the opening of its winter session on Oct. 15 "instead of dragging the decision for weeks," Rivlin said. A member of the ruling Likud party, Rivlin predicted the early election probably would take place during the second half of February and that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu would win another term. Elections may come because the governing coalition cannot agree on approving the 2013 budget.

Israeli innovation dragged down by red tape: report

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Israel is still a world leader in innovation and a great place to hatch a new idea or technology. But if you want to build a business based on that technology, you'll have to contend with high startup costs, an economy in which a small number of companies dominate, and a lengthy application and approval process for your business.

On the other hand, if it's high-level high-tech research you seek, there is no better place to find it than in Israel's universities, ranked the best in the world.

These are the findings of a Global Competitiveness Report by the World Economic Forum, the Swiss foundation that crunches economic data from around the world and issues recommendations on how to address economic problems. The group is best known for its annual meeting of top government and financial officials in Davos. The report ranks 144 countries for more than 100 variables, including business-friendliness, efficiency, innovation, educational resources, institutions — everything that goes into measuring what the group terms "competitiveness," an indication of where businesses, and which economies, are most likely to thrive.

The information in the report is organized around 14 "pillars," including quality of infrastructure, health and education, access to financial services, state of technology, and makeup of the labour force. Some of the information comes from publicly available government databases and UN data, but much of it is gleaned from a global survey of top business executives in each country, about 14,000 worldwide (the number per country varies; in 2011, about 100 responded to the survey in Israel). Questions range across a variety of topics, such as the protection of property rights and intellectual property, how common bribery is in business, how reliable law enforcement is, how much the government encourages innovation, and many more.

With all factors taken into account, Israel fell four slots from last year, from 22nd most competitive to 26th. Innovation, as measured by the number of patents filed per capita (fourth in the world) and ease of access to venture capital (third), is still Israel's strong point, with the country coming in third overall for innovation.

What drags Israel down, the report said, is the unspectacular state of Israel's high school math and science education (Israel ranks 89th in this area, between Pakistan and Cambodia); bureaucracy (it takes more time to file documents and follow procedures to open a business in Israel than it does in 108 other countries) and a rather high level of redundancy costs (compensation for workers who are laid off). While workers might not consider that latter statistic to be a negative, the report reflects the responses of business leaders.

Israel could stand a more competitive business environment, according to those who responded to the survey. A few business groups dominate corporate activity, with Israel ranking poorly (124th) in this area.

Israel is not the worst offender in the category of excess bureaucracy, and indeed, comes off better than many would expect in some areas. For example, Israel comes in about halfway down the scale, ranking 90th for "burdensomeness" in government regulations, licences and reporting. The report called this a drag on the Israeli economy, which in recent years had turned into an innovation-driven, technologically elite economy.

One of the questions addresses the added expense of doing business in light of terrorism, and as expected, Israel ranks high in this area, at 128. But those costs are even higher in Turkey, Lebanon, and Egypt — and not much lower in the United States, which came in at number 124 in this area. (Countries where terrorism costs are not much of a concern include Austria, Finland, Iceland, Hungary and Slovenia).

The technology section is, perhaps as would be expected, where Israel shines. Israel ranks high for utilizing new technologies (fifth) and importing technology via investment (14th). However, for high-speed Internet bandwidth availability, Israel is in 80th place, barely beating out the Dominican Republic, Libya, Thailand, and Vietnam. On the other hand, Israel ranked high (ninth) for the number of scientists and researchers in the country, as did, perhaps surprisingly to many Israelis, Jordan (11th). Israel also ranked high in company research-and-development spending (sixth), the ability to innovate (sixth), and the level of co-operation and collaboration between business and universities (eighth).

According to the report, Israel has the best scientific research institutions in the world, beating out Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States — and Qatar, which ranked fifth in this area. But that educational prowess does not filter down to the high schools. Besides the aforementioned poor showing in secondary math and science education, Israel's high schools are not particularly impressive, ranking only 53rd in the world.

The report also ranked macroeconomic indicators, and here, too, there were some surprises — such as the total tax rate. Israel's rate (a combination of tax on profits, labour and other taxes) is a relatively mild 31.2 per cent, far better than most of Europe and even better than the United States, where the total tax rate is 46.7 per cent.

And in more good news for Israelis, the chances that Israel will go bankrupt is much lower than in many other places, including Iran. Israel has a 29 per cent chance of defaulting on its debt, the report said, compared to Iran, where likelihood of that happening is 71 per cent.

Ha'aretz suspends edition as employees protest layoffs

JTA

TEL AVIV — The Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz had to suspend its daily edition for one day last week because of an employee protest over 100 layoffs.

Employees of the paper did not produce its Thursday edition, protesting the refusal of the paper's management to meet with representatives of the employees.

The paper was expected to resume publication on Friday, when Israeli papers print an expanded edition — akin to Sunday papers in the United States.

In an open letter in response to the printing freeze, Ha'aretz publisher Amos Schocken said the layoffs are a painful but necessary sacrifice to keep the paper running.

"In recent years I've made a huge effort to ensure Ha'aretz continues to exist and fulfil its unique role in Israeli society, in addition to being a reasonable place of employment," wrote Schocken. "Keeping Ha'aretz alive requires harsh measures which made no one happy."

The Israeli daily newspaper Ma'ariv is also facing substantial layoffs due to declining revenue. Ma'ariv's employees have protested the measures.

Jaffa Road lets in some light

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Toronto-based music group Jaffa Road is all about soundscapes and harmony these days.

The award-winning, multi-ethnic, uber-talented dub jazz fusion world-music band is set to release its sophomore album, Where The Light Gets In, later this month.

The group, fronted by vocalist Aviva Chernick and backed by its founder, guitarist and oud player Aaron Lightstone, bassist-producer Chris Gartner, percussionist Jeffrey Wilson, and on winds by Sundar Viswanathan, has crafted yet another stunning album.

JAFFA ROAD

Where The Light Gets In features sweeping Middle Eastern-inspired arrangements and instrumentation. Chernick's ethereal and welcoming voice evinces the deeply spiritual nature of the lyrics and compositions throughout the recording.

For those unfamiliar with Jaffa Road and Chernick, the group often reworks traditional Hebrew, Ladino and French songs with its own contemporary twists, but always with reverence and joy.

This album follows that trend.

Where The Light Gets In delves more heavily into ambient atmospherics than Jaffa Road's 2010 breakout release, Sunplace, did, giving it a more polished feel.

Standout tracks include the jazzy and contagious meditative take of Sim Shalom, the epic instrumental Indian-tinged journey of Hamidbar Medaber and the uplifting On Your Way.

Jaffa Road will release the album at a launch party on Oct. 28 at Hugh's Room, 2261 Dundas St. W., in Toronto. For more information, visit www.jaffaroad.com.

Political thriller Argo delivers the goods

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Ben Affleck's taut political thriller, Argo, which opens in Toronto on Oct. 12, takes a viewer on a scintillating ride.

Inspired by the 1979 hostage crisis in Iran, it is being released at a most propitious time, when the United States and Iran are at loggerheads over Iran's nuclear program and when U.S. diplomats in the Middle East are under deadly attack by Islamic radicals.

Argo, which premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival last month, imparts an aura of anxiety and dread from the outset as an enraged mob shouts anti-American slogans in front of the besieged U.S. embassy in Tehran.

With anger boiling over, a wave of Iranians storms the building. Inside, diplomats are busy burning top-secret documents. As the tension mounts, six diplomats evade capture by escaping and finding refuge in the Canadian ambassador's residence.

At this juncture, Argo pivots to U.S. Central Intelligence Agency headquarters in Washington, D.C., where an audacious plan is being hatched to spirit the six Americans out of Iran, right past the unsuspecting noses of scowling Iranian Revolutionary Guards. The plot is based on a book written by Tony Mendez, the CIA agent who masterminded the plan.

The scheme is quite clever. The Americans will be smuggled out of Iran as members of a Canadian crew scouting locations in Tehran for a science fiction movie to be shot at a later date.

Mendez sets up a fake production company in Los Angeles and enlists the services of two cynical Hollywood veterans, Lester Siegel (Alan Arkin) and John Chambers (John Goodman), to lend his caper a legitimate sheen.

In his quest for unassailable authenticity, Mendez, played to perfection by Affleck, thinks of every conceivable angle. He commissions a script, as well as artwork, and invites journalists to a press conference to generate publicity about the forthcoming movie.

Nonetheless, the hired hands are skeptical. Siegel, a stereotypical Hollywood type portrayed by Arkin in his usual droll style, dismisses the plan as suicidal, while Chambers calls it a "Star Wars ripoff."

Meanwhile, Mendez's superiors also voice doubt about his out-of-the-box project. With effortless self-confidence, he counters by saying that it's "the best bad

As Affleck has admitted, the script gives Mendez far too much credit for the escape, while minimizing the integral role that the resourceful Canadian ambassador, Ken Taylor (Victor Garber), played in getting the Americans out of Iran.

Still, Argo ensnares viewers with its realistic and suspenseful action scenes, shot in Istanbul and California, and its well-chosen cast of performers. The Iranian actors who depict edgy Iranian government functionaries are especially believable.

To its credit, Argo pokes self-deprecating fun at skin-deep Hollywood values and mores, leaving viewers with the distinct and unmistakable impression that honest, straightforward people are hard to find in the movie industry.

Argo, however, descends to a certain level of implausibility as it reaches its nail-biting climax in Tehran airport. But this subtle faux pas is merely a minor distraction or annoyance in a film that basically delivers the goods.

Show brings holidays to the stage

Cara Stern
Special to the CJN

in the past. He calls this show a "cavalcade of the Jewish calendar."

It isn't a play in the usual sense that there's dialogue between characters, he said, explaining that it's more of a running narrative set to music.

"When we make a statement, there's always a song which relates to the statement," he said. For example, one statement might have to do with the early days of Zionism, and how Israel was once a dream, and now it is a reality and a necessity, he said.

About 10 performers will be on stage, some of whom are not as "advanced in age" as Garnick, as he put it, but they're not youngsters, either. Every one of them has had a background on the stage, he added.

"[The show is] a nostalgia for the people who were raised in homes where some Yiddish was spoken. They remember phrases and words that their parents used," he said.

He said the number of people who speak Yiddish as well as the visibility of the Yiddish culture has declined in recent years in Toronto.

"It's not in full bloom anymore, but when I was growing up, there were Yiddish schools where they actually taught Yiddish," he said. "We speak of Israel where the national speech is Hebrew, but there's still a place in the hearts of Jews for the Yiddish language."

Garnick said he hopes audiences will find real meaning in the show.

"I think they're going to be proud that they're Jewish," he said. "They're going to be reminded of their very rich heritage."

The show Let There Be Light will be presented at the City Playhouse in Thornhill, Ont., at 2 p.m. on Oct. 14. For tickets, call 905-882-7469.

The theatre company New Voices for Yiddish will be taking audiences through a musical journey of the Jewish calendar.

Their latest show, Let There Be Light, covers the time "from Rosh Hashanah to Rosh Hashanah," bringing each holiday in between to life through music and song, said director and writer Nathan Garnick.

"We say what all the holidays are for and how they're celebrated, and we also don't exclude the commemorations of very sad events that happened in Jewish history," he said. "And we accompany all our narrative with appropriate music for each occasion."

Garnick, now in his 90s, has been producing shows for New Voices for Yiddish for decades. Their performances used to be held at the now-defunct Leah Posluns Theatre, often in connection with the Jewish Book Fair. Since the theatre is no longer standing, he needed to find a new location, and decided on the City Playhouse in Thornhill, as it is still on Bathurst Street, despite being farther north than the previous venue.

He was concerned that the Thornhill location could be a "handicap," noting that it might be difficult for the midtown and downtown Toronto crowd to get there. However, "we risk the chance and we hope people will respond," he said, adding that at the Leah Posluns Theatre the company would perform to sold-out audiences and hopes they will do the same in Thornhill.

Apart from the new location, Garnick said this year's performance is quite different from his previous shows because it focuses on a historical narrative, rather than a literary one, which has been his specialty

416-789-5502 or info@winchevskycentre.org

Actor and activist Peter Kastner, who is best remembered for his starring role in the 1964 film Nobody Waved Goodbye, is going to be given a final wave goodbye this week in the form of a tribute concert by David Rovics in his memory.

Kastner, who died in 2008 just short of his 65th birthday, returned to Toronto in the last decade of his life after his career in movies went into decline. A songwriter and musician, he performed a one-man show at Free Times Cafe, Yuk Yuks and other venues here. In the show he "not only milked the irony of his own career crash but attacked his mother, the late Rose Kastner, resulting in a bitter estrangement from his three siblings and other members of the family." Martin Knelman noted in an obituary in the Toronto Star.

In Toronto Kastner became involved with various leftist Jewish organizations: the Winchevsky Centre, United Jewish People's Order, the Morris Winchevsky School and the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, as well as the Baycrest Centre. Thus it seems appropriate that activist-singer-songwriter Rovics will perform the tribute concert to raise funds for a monument at Kastner's gravesite.

Rovics, a darling of the discontented left and the Occupy Movement, plays at pubs, universities, churches, union halls and protest rallies, and his music has been featured on the BBC and Al-Jazeera. He performs the Kastner Tribute as part of a continuing North American and European tour. Sharon & Bram are MCs for the evening.

Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave. Oct. 16, 7:30 p.m. Tickets $18, $20; includes refreshments. Reservations, Golden Age of Yiddish Radio: Singer, actor and comedian Max Mandel (1908-1953) was one of the stars of Yiddish radio in its heyday from the late 1930s to the early 1950s, when many of Toronto's Jews were Yiddish-speaking immigrants and their children.

In a program titled The Golden Age of Yiddish Radio and Max Mandel's The Jewish Hour, his son, Michael Mandel, a law professor at Osgoode Hall, tells the story of Yiddish radio, its performers and personalities, and what it meant for the community to hear the music of performers, newspaper commentators and critics in Yiddish.

Wiesel's latest novel explores Mideast conflict, terrorism

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Shaltiel Feigenberg is a middle-aged storyteller in Brooklyn on his way to visit a friend when he is kidnapped by two men seeking the release of three Palestinian prisoners.

His four-day confinement is the setting of Elie Wiesel's latest novel Hostage (Knopf). Although, this being a Wiesel novel, much of the action, as one would expect, takes place inside the protagonist's head.

It is 1975, the middle of a volatile decade. Gerald Ford is in office, the Munich massacre at the Olympics and the Yom Kippur War are not far behind, and the rise of the PLO is consuming much of Israeli intelligence's resources.

But Shaltiel doesn't understand why he has been taken. Surely it's a case of mistaken identity. In his own words, the virtually unknown writer – soon to be catapulted onto the world stage – is a nobody.

As a boy, Shaltiel was a chess prodigy. Born in Galicia, Hungary, he was the son of Haskell, a pedlar of old books. Growing up, just before the war, he loved and admired his father, relishing the Sabbath, virtually the only time he could spend time with his travelling father.

"In prison you cling to memory," Wiesel writes.

As he sits in a dark basement blindfolded, Shaltiel is physically and verbally abused by his kidnappers. Unaware of what time it is, whether it's even day or night, he allows his mind to wander back to his past.

It was chess that saved Shaltiel's life.

When the Hungarians started rounding up Jews, late during World War II, Feigenberg was seven. An aristocratic German takes to the boy after discovering his chess-playing ability. As the Hungarian Jews were forced into ghettos, the count spirits the boy to a hideout where they continue their regular chess games.

"As long as I'm here, you and your family are safe," the count tells him.

But he lied. The rest of his family wasn't so lucky. All of them died except for his father, who miraculously survived the death march from Auschwitz.

The novel goes back and forth between the present and the past. The introduction of Israeli special agents tracking his disappearance early in the novel hints at a potential thriller that never really materializes.

Most of the action takes place as verbal debates either between him and the kidnappers or in his own mind with his memories.

Shaltiel is convinced from the onset that he will be killed in the end. He believes that like Dostoyevsky he'll witness the preparations for his own execution.

He comforts himself by the words of Maimonides who said that no commandment surpasses the obligation to liberate hostages.

But then he remembers the story of the Maharam of Rottenburg who, when arrested in 1286, instructed the Jewish community not to pay his ransom.

If a sage like Maharam, author of essential volumes on the history of religion, can be left to his fate, what chance did he – a nobody – have?

The 200-page novel is not without digressions. The story of Shaltiel's brother who fled to Russia before the war and became a rising star in the Communist Party does little to add to the main story line, although it does bring up the theme of redemption, one of many themes in Hostage.

The best part of the book is the intellectual discussions Shaltiel has with Luigi (an Italian, one of his kidnappers, the other being Ahmed, an Arab, who is more prone to verbal abuse than intellectual debates).

His kidnappers belong to the Palestinian Revolutionary Group – and this kidnapping is part of a new strategy to destabilize Israel by striking at American Jews.

When given a chance, Shaltiel gives Luigi a lesson in historical truths on the history of Israel and the Arab rejection of the partition.

The two end up having a verbal chess game, and one gets the feeling that the premise is merely a way for Wiesel to discuss Palestine, Israel, the occupation, revolution and terrorism.

Weighty stuff inside what otherwise is a straightforward book about hostage taking.

And, of course, a Wiesel book wouldn't be complete without touching upon the themes of the Holocaust, silence and the nature of evil.

Recent arrivals:

- The Book of Mischief (Farrar, Straus and Giroux) triumphantly showcases 25 years of outstanding work by one of the true masters of the short story. Steve Stern's collection takes us from the old Jewish quarter of the Pinch in Memphis, Tenn., to an immigrant community in New York, the market towns of eastern Europe and a Catskills resort.

- With the U.S. election just around the corner, Ruthie Blum's To Hell in a Handbasket: Carter, Obama and the 'Arab Spring' (RVP Press) is a timely treatise on the Democratic presidents' record in the Middle East.

The title tells all. Don't expect an objective account from the right-wing columnist and blogger.

- Hello Gorgeous by William J. Mann (Thomas Allen & Sons) is a biography of Barbra Streisand, chronicling her climb to fame during her New York years.

The biographer of Katharine Hepburn and Elizabeth Taylor recreates a vibrant piece of New York theatrical history that made Streisand's breakout possible.

A must for fans.

- First published in 1984, Trudi Kanter's Some Girls, Some Hats and Hitler (Scribner) tells the remarkable true story of Kanter's journey through war-torn Europe as an Austrian Jew. After disappearing into the inferno of second-hand bookstores, Some Girls was recently rediscovered by an editor who fell in love with it and was determined to bring this remarkable memoir back to life.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Levy looks back at satisfying tennis career

Ben Fisher

Special to The CJN

Between three years of military service and almost two years lost to knee and hip surgeries, Harel Levy missed out on a good portion of what should have been the prime of his professional tennis career.

Still, the smiling 34-year-old sitting in the lobby of the York Racquets tennis club in Toronto recently hardly looked cheated. Participating alongside tennis greats such as Brad Gilbert, Daniel Nestor and Dean Goldfine at the 2012 MDC Partners Invitational Tennis Pro-Am in support of the Israel Tennis Centres, Levy made it clear that he is a man without regrets.

"I feel incredibly blessed to have had the career that I did," says Levy, who once ranked No. 30 in the world. "I'm very proud to have represented Israel, both in the military and as a Davis Cup competitor. I played for 14 years [from 1995 to 2009 as a full-time competitor] with some great wins and great memories."

One of the biggest among those memories came in Toronto in 2000, where Levy reached the final of the Masters Series event now known as the Rogers Cup. Ranked No. 144 in the world, the Ramat Hasharon resident broke through qualifying rounds and pushed through five rounds against higher-ranked opposition – including then-world No. 27 Sebastien Grosjean – before falling to Marat Safin in the final.

For Levy, the week was made even more significant just hours after the final, when he was notified that he had officially completed his military service.

"That week was amazing for so many reasons," recalls Levy. "The support I got from the Toronto fans, the experience of getting to a Masters [Series] final and then, getting the call from the IDF to thank me for my service. It definitely stands out as a major highlight of my career."

The support he enjoyed in Toronto was not entirely unique. Levy believes that being Israeli actually helped him connect with fans and get tennis crowds behind him.

"There are a lot of Jewish tennis fans out there, especially in North America. It meant a lot to know that they were behind me and supporting me at events," said Levy. "I would normally be playing on smaller courts, so I could always hear them and could get energy from them."

Levy might not have collected much hardware over his career (his lone ATP title came in doubles alongside Jonathan Erlich at the 2000 Newport grass event), but the 2000 Masters Series final appearance is hardly his only highlight. He owns victories over legends of the sport like Pete Sampras, Andy Roddick and Michael Chang and boasts a respectable 23-20 record over 11 years representing Israel in the Davis Cup.

The 2001 win over Roddick in the Nottingham semifinals served as both a highlight and lowlight for Levy. On one hand, it moved him into his second career ATP final (he would lose to Thomas Johansson). On the other hand, a mid-match slip-up on the grass eventually led to right hip surgery later in the year that kept him on the shelf for over six months.

Now, after all of his highs and lows, triumphs and injuries, Levy is ready to look ahead to life after competitive tennis.

He is currently studying economics and management in Israel in order to pursue future business opportunities, as well as continuing to have an informal advisory role within the Israel Tennis Association and helping out with the country's Davis Cup squad, which is headed to the World Group after recently defeating Japan to qualify.

"Getting back into the [World Group] is a very important accomplishment for us, but there's a pretty big hole right now, at least when it comes to high performance tennis," Levy admitted. "We've got to focus on building elite level players, starting with a few young players we have now with a lot of potential."

Even with injuries and military service playing a role, Levy was able to squeeze a great deal out of a 14-year tennis career. Now, it's time to help others achieve a similar level of success.

Greenberg gets one more chance in majors

JTA

MIAMI — Adam Greenberg, who was beamed in his only Major League at-bat in 2005, struck out as a pinch-hitter after being given a one-day contract by the Miami Marlins.

New York Mets' R.A. Dickey, a knuckleballer and leading contender for the National League's Cy Young Award, fanned Greenberg on three pitches in the sixth inning. Wearing No. 10, the former Chicago Cubs' player swung and missed at the second and third pitches thrown by Dickey, who said, "I am going to treat him like a big leaguer and that is why he is here."

Despite the strikeout, Greenberg returned to the dugout smiling and was greeted by high fives and hugs from his teammates for the day.

Greenberg's story resurfaced in September when he was tapped to replace the injured Gabe Kapler for Team Israel in the World Baseball Classic qualifiers in Jupiter, Fla. In his only at-bat of the qualifiers, Greenberg walked against South Africa and scored on a single by Shawn Green coupled with an error.

At approximately the same time, an on-line campaign called "One at Bat" had fans rallying for Greenberg to be given another shot at the majors. He was struck in the head in his one at-bat while playing for the Cubs. Not having played for a Major League organization since 2008, Greenberg was offered the second chance on Sept. 28 when the Marlins surprised him with a one-day contract announced live on NBC's Today show.

Marlins manager Ozzie Guillen suggested he might start Greenberg, who played for the independent Bridgeport (Conn.) Bluefish from 2008 to 2011, but ultimately settled for the pinch-hit opportunity.

"Life throws you curveballs," Greenberg told the Associated Press shortly before his at-bat at season's end. "Mine threw me a fastball at 92, and it hit me in the back of the head. I got up from it, and my life is great."

Overachiever Makes Operatic Debut

Rita Poliakov
Special to The CJN

When Lori Ossip got onstage for her first singing audition, she refused to make a sound.

"I was such a shy kid... I was about eight or seven. I was kind of humming in my mom's car and apparently she realized I can sing. Automatically she said, 'We're taking you to an audition,'" Ossip said.

"I went for my audition [for the choir at the Jewish Community Centre.] I actually refused to sing for the lady... She even offered to go outside and listen in the window, but for some reason I refused. Since then, I've been trying to prove that yes, I can do it."

And she's succeeded. In mid-September, Ossip, 19, became the youngest person to sing both a duet and solo in Opera Luminata, which she performed at the Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts.

While Ossip only started taking singing lessons at around 10 years old, she spent most of her childhood perfecting songs that only she could sing.

"I don't think I had a choice. I just sang. It was just my thing. I remember I had songs that no one else could sing," she said, adding that I Won't Say I'm In Love, from Disney's 1997 animated feature film, Hercules, was one of those songs.

When Ossip started taking singing lessons, she began concentrating on classical music, which eventually led to her love of opera.

"I have a strong passion for opera. I really appreciate it. I recognize how difficult it is to sing. It's a challenge," she said.

Opera, according to Ossip, usually means higher notes and hours of training.

"A lot of times the notes go faster, there are bigger jumps [between octaves], there are more technical elements that come into play," she said.

"You sing something, you're tired afterwards. Not your voice, but your body."

It's these challenges that make each song so rewarding. Especially when Ossip perfects one.

"Oh my God, it's like you've finally done something right. You always start a song and it's brutal... When I can get the song, it's so rewarding... It's almost as good as being on stage."

The stage was something Ossip conquered soon after she started taking singing lessons. In her first production, which she performed as part of an after-school program, Ossip refused to sing a solo. Instead, she auditioned for, and got, the part of the wicked witch in The Wizard of Oz.

"I was so scared," she said.

But all that changed two months after her first show.

"Two months later, I was singing in [Aladdin]," she said, adding that the show was part of a summer program.

Ever since then, Ossip fell in love with theatre. So much so, that she can't really see herself doing anything else.

"I love performing and I love opera. It's so hard. I've stage-managed before. I've been the person in the back with the headset, and that's really fun, but it's so hard seeing other people go onstage and you're itching to go out and do something," she said.

Which is why the teen was so excited when she found out about Opera Luminata, a show mixed with musical theatre pieces, opera and special effects like fireworks or lasers.

Ossip first heard about the Opera Luminata from her singing teacher, the lead soprano on the show.

"She recommended me. She got me talking to the right people. I was ecstatic. It's my regional theatre debut, and I've been waiting for that forever. Especially since I've been training classically for the past nine years," she said.

Ossip performed a solo – an operetta called One Kiss – and a duet called Stranger in Paradise, from the 1953 musical Kismet. The duet was particularly challenging for Ossip.

"I think the most difficult part was the acting in Stranger in Paradise. I've never really done partner work, like strong, adult partner work. I'm only 19. In high school, we don't do very deep love scenes," said Ossip, an Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto graduate.

One of the hardest parts for Ossip wasn't the performance, which took place Sept. 14 and 15. It was the rehearsals.

"I was trying to figure out my motive [in the scene] and then sharing it with the world, which was scary. I'm a naturally shy person," she said.

"When you get onstage, there's a fourth wall. You're separated from the audience. In rehearsal, you see everyone."

It was during these rehearsals when Ossip felt the most intimidated.

"Pouring your heart out when there's everybody there is a difficult thing to learn how to do. You have to be very vulnerable at all times. If the director says, 'No, I don't like that choice, make a new one,' you have to push it even further until you find a [choice] the director likes."

For Ossip, the performances were particularly rewarding.

"It's very freeing. My acting teacher would say, 'What happens in Vegas stays in Vegas.' She'd say, 'When you're onstage, it's like you're in Vegas. You get away with so much more on the stage,'" she said.

"It was so exciting. It's a rush."

Ossip is just about to begin her second year at the University of Chicago, where she's majoring in both theatre and economics.

The 19-year-old got a 4.0 GPA after her first year, an accomplishment that meant lots of time in the library.

"[The University of Chicago] is known to be one of the most academically rigorous schools in the world," Ossip said.

"I'm an overachiever. I push myself way too hard... You really get used to not sleeping. I did what I had to do."

"כמה שקיות! החלטת להעלות לקניון את המניות?"
אני שואלת את טלי. שניראית מותשת. כשהיא מטיחה
כחמישים אלף שקיות נייר מהדורות על הכסא לידה.
"את יודעת שקניות עושות לי מצב רוח טוב. מה

הבעיה שלך?" היא צועקת. מנסה לתפוס את התומת
לב המלצרית. "רואים שאת במצב רוח טוב כרגע..."

אני אומרת. "עדיף לי לקנות בגדים. מאשר להיכנס לדיכאונת". פוסקת טלי.
אני מתערבת איתך על מיליון דולר שקנית שטויות שלא תלכשי יותר מפעם.
טלי (סוף סוף תופסת את המלצרית ומזמינה): את עדיין חייבת לי שני מיליון
דולר מההתערבות הקודמת. למה שלא תבואי איתי פעם הבאה לקנות משהו?

אני: בסדר, למה לא? אני דווקא די במוד לקניות.

טלי (בפליאה): באמת? חשבתו שתבכני. או שתברחי מבית הקפה בצעקות.
אני: למה? אני מתה על מבצעים ומציאות. ואני באמת צריכה לקנות לי מסטיק.

טלי: זה היה בעצוק. אני שונאת לקנות איתך. את בלתי ניסבלת. בלתי.

אני: מה. שאני אוהבת למדוד מאה הולציות? שאני שואלת שאלות נוקבות לגבי
הפריטים. לגבי חיי הלילה של המוכרות. לגבי האקנה של המוכרים הצעירים?

טלי: שאת קמצנית (מתנשפת). זהו, אמרת את זה.

לבת שלך סווצ'ר מדהים ליום ההולדת שלה? טלי. את פשוט כפויית טובה!

טלי: עזבי. בואי נסגור את העניין (ואחרי שניה). ועוד אחרי שקנית לך צעוף!

טלי: אני באמת צריכה לענות על זה? ואת אפילו לא הודת לי כראוי על הצעוף!

טלי (לוגמת מהקפה שלה וצווחת קלות): שיילכו לעזאזל עם הקפה שלהם. הם!

אני (בשאננות): טוב. תקראי לי משוגעת, אבל מצב רוח טוב. זה לא עשה לך.

טלי: אני אקרא לך משוגעת, ואחרי הקפה יש לי להיכנס לעוד שתי חנויות. זה

יתן לי זמן לחזור הביתה. להניח את השקיות בצד. ולהכניס את הראש לתנור.

אני (מבוהלת): ממי, את מדאגה אותי, בואי נירגע. לא צריך ראש בתנור. מה

אני יכולה לעשות כדי לשפר את מצב רוחך? רק תגיד. למה את צועקת?

טלי: תודי שאת קמצנית, ושהסווצ'ר של הבת המסכנה שלי עלה לך גרוש

אני: מודה. ומודה לך גם על הצעוף. קנתי לי עוד שניים בצבע אחר בדולרמה.

If Jews were refugees today

If you, a Jew, were a refugee today and had just arrived on a filthy boat where disease was rampant and your family needed medical care, there's a great likelihood you'd be tossed out of the emergency wards at Sunnybrook Hospital or North York General.

You might be walking hand in hand with your child. The nurse would ask you to pay up front for the medical care required for your daughter's terrible chest cough, the one that produced green phlegm, and you'd say you're unable to do so.
Security would escort you out.

The following is what actually happened to some refugees in our country, Canada, over the summer, in our Canadian hospitals and clinics, since cuts to the refugee health care services – the Interim Federal Health Program (IFH) – took effect in a bid to keep refugees out.

A male refugee claimant experiencing chest pain, potentially tuberculosis, was not eligible for a chest X-ray. A female refugee claimant with fibroids and adenomyo-sis had surgery cancelled due to her status and, therefore, has had numerous emergency room and doctor's office visits for severe pain. A young female refugee claimant was 18 weeks pregnant as a result of a sexual assault while being used as a sexual slave. She had no IFH coverage to address the pregnancy.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Doctors across Canada who care for refugees have formed Canadian Doctors for Refugee Care (CDRC) to document cases like these. Dr. Philip Berger, chief of family and community medicine at St. Michael's Hospital and a member of this group, stated that "the health of all refugees is being placed at risk" by the IFH cutbacks.

"We advised the government that these program cuts would reduce care, increase costs to other areas of the health system, needlessly threaten public safety, and regrettably, this is exactly what our colleagues are seeing in clinics and hospitals across Canada," Berger added.

CDRC has discovered that clinics and hospitals are refusing to care for refugees because of confusion surrounding IFH coverage. Another survey of 30 walk-in clinics in Toronto revealed that only five were accepting IFH coverage for refugees and understood the new rules.

Other examples of refugees suffering because of our government's policies include a male refugee with three children, two requiring immunizations and a third requiring follow-up on an operation on his aorta at birth who were turned away from two clinics and unable to see a physician.

A female refugee claimant with diabetes and chronic kidney disease saw her condition deteriorate because of lack of access to medication, regular blood testing and monitoring. She is a senior.

Another refugee claimant, 32 weeks pregnant, arrived at two emergency rooms with lower abdominal pain and was told she would have to sign a document stating she would be responsible for the costs of her visit. She left emergency without being seen.

"Physicians will continue to track individual patient cases and report back on our findings," said Dr. Meb Rashid, medical director of the Crossroads Clinic at Women's College Hospital. "We are not going away until the government does the right thing and completely reverses these reckless health care cuts."

If Jews were refugees today...

"This is no time for Canada to act on humanitarian grounds... Canada must be guided by realities and political considerations" – prime minister Mackenzie King, 1938, recorded in his diary, arguing that any action permitting an appreciable number of Jews to settle in Canada would undermine the unity of the nation.

Israel developing 'digital Iron Dome'

Asher Zeiger
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israel's National Cyber Committee is developing a "digital Iron Dome" system to protect the country against daily cyber attacks, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told his cabinet on Sunday.

Israel has of late made fighting cyber terrorism a priority, creating a cyber task force and pouring resources into stopping Internet attacks from regional rivals and small-time hackers.

"Every day, many attempts are made to infiltrate Israel's computer systems," Netanyahu warned. "Just as we have the Iron Dome against missiles and the security fence against infiltrators and terrorism, we will have a similar protection against cyber attacks."

However, the prime minister added that "as with the construction of the security fence, this will take time to complete."

Reports surfaced earlier this year that Iran had tried to attack Israel's Bank Hapoalim, although it was thwarted. Last January, Saudi hackers published credit card details of thousands of Israelis and brought down the websites of El Al and the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange.

Last week, U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta said that Iran was stepping up cyber attacks on regional rivals, including a Saudi oil facility.

"These attacks mark a significant escalation of the cyber threat," Panetta said. "And they have renewed concerns about still more destructive scenarios that could unfold."

Iranian officials on Sunday denied any role in the cyber attacks against oil and gas companies in the Persian Gulf.

A report by the semi-official ISNA news agency quoted Mahdi Akhavan Bahabadi, who is head of Iran's National Center of Cyberspace, as saying that allegations of an Iranian link to the attacks on Saudi state oil company Aramco and Qatari natural gas producer RasGas were "politically motivated."

Bahabadi said Iran is ready to co-operate in finding the source of the attacks. He said Iran has offered help to boost the companies' cyber security, as Iran has itself recently been the victim of cyber attacks on offshore oil platforms.

Tehran has reportedly developed its own cyber-attack team in response to computer bugs, blamed on the United States and Israel, that have affected Iran's nuclear program.

Jerusalem Artist Dies

TORONTO — Jerusalem artist Azriel Cohen died unexpectedly in his sleep Oct. 5 while visiting family in Toronto. He was 47. His sister told the Jerusalem Post that doctors think he died from a blood clot or undetected heart problem. The Toronto-born Cohen was known for helping to found Ohr Olam, a spiritual centre for Israelis in Dharmasala, India, and for his Travelling Jerusalem Cafe art installation of portraits drawn in Jerusalem cafes during the second intifadah.

WORLD

Bris Law OKed

BERLIN — Germany's cabinet approved a proposed circumcision law Oct. 10 that's welcomed by Jewish and Muslim groups. The law, which is subject to parliamentary debate, introduces restrictions on the practice of non-medical circumcision on male children with the aim of protecting religious freedom in light of recent attacks on the practice. A vote in Germany's parliament is expected in the fall. A campaign against ritual circumcision by a cadre of activists, backed by some left-wing politicians, gathered steam last May after a Cologne court ruled circumcising a minor is criminal assault. In response, Jewish and Muslim leaders urged the government to protect their religious freedom.

Jews Win Nobels

STOCKHOLM — Robert Lefkowitz, a Jewish physician and biochemist, won the Nobel Prize in chemistry with Brian Kobilka, a Stanford University researcher. Lefkowitz, 61, and Kobilka, 57, won for "groundbreaking discoveries that reveal the inner workings of an important family... of receptors: G-protein-coupled receptors," the Nobel Prize Committee said. Understanding how these receptors function helped further explain

Court Rules On Internet Hate Case

OTTAWA — The Federal Court of Canada has ruled that the hate-speech provision in Section 13 of Canada's Human Rights Act should have been applied to a complaint about Internet-based hate.

The court ruled that a tribunal erred when it did not apply the provision in a 2009 decision involving Marc Lemire, webmaster of freedomsite.org and a former leader of the extremist Heritage Front.

Ottawa activist Richard Warman, a former employee of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, filed a complaint against Lemire, alleging he violated the act by permitting postings that were likely to expose gays and blacks to hatred or contempt.

The ruling came after the House of Commons voted to repeal Section 13. The issue is now before the Senate. Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center stated "the real significance of this decision may lie in the momentum it will provide for politicians to consider replacing Section 13 with a more workable provision that has as its objective suppression of the vilest forms of expression over the Internet."

how cells could sense their environment. Lefkowitz, a New York native who works at the Howard Hughes Medical Institute of Duke University Medical Center in North Carolina, and Kobilka worked together to isolate and analyze a gene that led them to discover that "the receptor was similar to one in the eye that captures light. They realized that there is a whole family of receptors that look alike and function in the same manner," the Nobel Prize website said. A day earlier, the Nobel committee announced that Serge Haroche, a French Jewish physicist, won the Nobel Prize in physics along with David Wineland of the United States. And on Monday, American Alvin Roth, a professor at Harvard University, won the Nobel for economics, along with fellow American Lloyd Shapley, a professor emeritus at UCLA. Each Nobel is worth $1.2 million in prize money.

New Reform synagogue opens downtown First south of Bloor Street

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

A new downtown Reform synagogue opened its doors this week at a ceremony that welcomed the shul into the community and the community into the shul.

"There isn't a Reform synagogue from Bloor [Street] all the way to the water, and that's a lot of Jews!" said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, who was sworn in as the rabbi of City Shul at the launch ceremony.

At the shul's opening ceremony on Oct. 14, she made a pledge to the community – and they pledged the same thing in return – to be compassionate and have a good relationship.

For 15 years, Rabbi Goldstein led the Kolel High Holiday services, first at the then-Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and later in a North York hotel's ballroom. As soon as she finished blowing the shofar on Yom Kippur, people would suggest that she also hold services for Sukkot and Simchat Torah. She wanted to see the congregants on a more regular basis as well.

"A lot of families and kids would then join other synagogues for bar and bat mitzvahs, which they should, but I felt like I missed the family," she said.

The new synagogue's services will take place in the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto.

Rabbi Goldstein said the synagogue is unique for many reasons. For example, it reaches a wide demographic. There are black, Asian, gay and lesbian members. Almost half of all the members of the synagogue have never belonged to one before.

Only one month ago did I rectify the horrible and inexcusable oversight of having omitted the name of Majdi Halabi in the list that appears on the editorial page of Israeli soldiers missing in action.

This week, we remove Halabi's name from the list.

Last week, alas, the Israel Defence Forces confirmed that human remains found in the Carmel Forest near the village of Usfiya, merely kilometres from his home in Daliyat al-Carmel, were those of Pte. Halabi. The 19-year-old soldier had disappeared in May 2005 while returning to his army base.

As reported by JTA, an Israeli civilian hiking in the area found the remains. They were likely discovered at this time as a result of last year's enormous fire on the mountain range that left a great deal of the forest floor exposed.

Police have still not been able to determine the cause of Halabi's death. Nor is it known if he died at the site where his remains were found or if he was moved there after his death.

Hundreds attended Halabi's funeral last Friday under the deep blue autumn sky over the Carmel Mountain.

Finally knowing the answer to the mystery of their son's disappearance could not, however, salve the deep wound in his parents' hearts. Friends and dignitaries attempted to comfort the family with words that were laudatory, empathetic and tender. But of course, no words are truly capable of consoling an individual for an inconsolable loss.

The Jerusalem Post reported that, at the funeral, Deputy Minister for Development of the Negev and Galilee Ayoub Kara, a native of Usfiya, expressed disbelief with the melancholy outcome.

"I have no words in my lexicon to describe the disappointment and sorrow from the terrible news we received yesterday... We looked for Majdi in Israel and across the world, and followed up every bit of information that we found about him. But in my worst dreams, I never believed that while I'm trying and speaking to officials from all over the world, including the Arab world, that Majdi Halabi was so close to home."

Science and Technology Minister Daniel Herschowitz and Opposition leader Shaul Mofaz also spoke at the funeral. According to the Post both men paid high tribute to the Druze community of Israel to which the Halabis belong, as well as to the Halabi family for their courage and strength.

The Post writer very poignantly also noted the attendance at the funeral of one especially interested and involved person.

"After the pallbearers shovelled dirt on Halabi's coffin and the military honour guard fired off a 21-gun salute, well-wishers stood in a single file line to give condolences to Halabi's father and other elder male members of his family.

"One man who lingered till the end was Tzvi Regev, father of the late IDF soldier Eldad Regev."

Eldad Regev, it will be recalled, and Ehud Goldwasser were killed by Hezbollah terrorists in July 2006 in a cross-border raid.

That raid was the final straw that led the Israeli government to attack Hezbollah forces in south Lebanon.

The bodies of Regev and Goldwasser were returned to their families in a prisoner exchange with Israel in July 2008. For two years, Hezbollah refused to allow anyone to have access to the soldiers. The organization cruelly and sadistically toyed with the emotions of the soldiers' families leading them to believe their sons were alive and even well. It was only on the eve of the exchange that the families were told the truth of their children's fate.

Regev told the Post reporter that the Halabi family had helped him and his family cope with the anguish and uncertainty of Eldad's "captivity."

"They were here for the two years that Eldad was gone, and now I'm here to do the little I can for them," Regev told the Post.

"We went through it for two years, the constant uncertainty and worrying. I have no idea how they did this for seven years," he added.

If only we were removing the name Majdi Halabi from the list of MiAs because he had returned safely to his home.

In mourning, Israel is one family. We mourn too. —MBD

Look again before donating: Just a Second shop

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Sofia Grinshpun, manager of Jewish Family & Child's (JF&CS) Just a Second Shop is puzzled.

She wants to know why her agency has to spend $2,000 every month disposing of the garbage that people dump in the store's yellow bins, meant for gently used clothing.

That $2,000, she said, could be used to send 20 vulnerable kids to Jewish day and overnight summer camps, because all proceeds from the store are used to send these kids to camp.

JF&CS clients can "buy" necessities at the store for free, or at a 50 per cent discount if the item is not a necessity.

Jo Michaels, manager, marketing and communications at JF&CS said, "When we say garbage, we don't mean stained or dirty clothing. That is actually collected by a company and we receive a small payment for it. We mean actual garbage – from ripped and ragged suitcases to dirty diapers.

"We have to pay a waste management company to come and empty the overflowing bin. If people stopped dumping garbage, we could empty the bin less than half as often."

After a garage sale, she said, people bring items to the store that they could not sell. "They think we can take anything without discretion. It is a misconception, and it is disrespectful to leave items that are soiled or broken."

"Staff at the store is so busy, we hate to have them be garbage pickers as well. It is certainly not a good use of their time."

Michaels said they request that items be in perfect shape. "We are very picky about what we display. When we get high quality donations, they fly off the rack."

"Before you bag up clothing and bring it in, think about whether you would buy it. We want people to shop with dignity. Sometimes emotions cloud judgment when they bring in clothing. They see memories of the person who wore it, but they don't see the condition the clothing is in."

She said that she would love to see the store rejuvenated. "It can use a facelift, but we've never had the budget to fix it up. We'd like to see Just a Second Shop become a cool, awesome thrift shop."

"It could be a great destination for shoppers, and all the money goes to a good cause. In a perfect world I would overhaul the whole store."

Chabad's Family Shul purchases church

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Chabad on the Avenue, which operates the Family Shul, has purchased the First Hungarian Baptist Church on Falkirk Avenue and will take possession late next month.

Rabbi Menachem Gansburg, spiritual leader of the Family Shul, would not disclose the purchase price, saying only that it was "in the millions."

Chabad has already solicited the majority of that sum from supporters but will hold a fundraiser on Nov. 25, two days after the deal closes, to raise the remainder. Hollywood entertainer Paula Abdul, accompanied by her rabbi from Chabad of Bel Air, will headline the function. She will discuss her spiritual journey and Jewish roots at an event at the Eglinton Grand, Rabbi Gansburg said.

Abdul's Jewish mother is part of the Rykiss family of Winnipeg.

Rabbi Gansburg said the new facility, which likely won't be ready for services until 2013, had been on his radar for several years. In fact, with the rapid growth of the Family Shul, it became clear that to continue to thrive the shul would need a permanent building for its religious services and community outreach.

Rabbi Gansburg said over the years the Shul had placed offers on various properties in the neighbourhood, but had repeatedly been outbid by developers.

On his own initiative, Rabbi Gansburg contacted members of the First Hungarian Baptist Church and made it clear the Family Shul was interested in purchasing the property. The church is in the middle of Chabad on the Avenue's catchment area, an area known as Ledbury Park.

"The church was not looking to sell. They had had offers from builders," Rabbi Gansburg said. Despite being rebuffed, Rabbi Gansburg maintained good relations with church officials. He befriended members of their board and "I never took 'no' for an answer. I kept up with them, asking what's new in their world."

Chabad is going to have to do something about those doors before the Family Shul moves into this building on Falkirk Avenue.

He learned the congregation was having trouble finding the money to maintain and upgrade the building. "After three and a half years, I called them on a random day, when I had lost an offer on a property to developers. They were having a meeting on the future of the congregation and they were now interested."

Working without real estate agents, they closed the "handshake" deal on Erev Yom Kippur. "No doubt we had some guidance from above," Rabbi Gansburg said.

He announced the acquisition on Kol Nidre night. Coupled with news of the Paula Abdul fundraiser, "there is a lot of buzz in the neighbourhood," he said.

He's been busy fielding calls from people interested in joining the shul. With room for an estimated 180-200 people, it's a good size for people who don't want to get lost in a larger synagogue, he said. Shabbat services at the Ledbury Park Elementary and Middle School typically attract 60-70 people, while 400 attended High Holiday services at the Beth Jacob High School.

Rabbi Gansburg estimates that more than 50 per cent of the Jews in the neighbourhood are unaffiliated and many live in mixed marriage households.

"Chabad felt there was room for Chabad-style programs" that bring traditional Jewish worship and education, but in a way that suits the neighbourhood, he said.

In addition to religious services, Chabad offers weekly education programs for more than 150 children.

Religious services are conducted largely in English and with plenty of commentary so that people understand the prayers. "It's tailor-made for the people who come to the shul... Our motto is, 'We're not Orthodox, Reform or Conservative. We're simply Jewish,'" Rabbi Gansburg said.

As for the future of the new building, Rabbi Gansburg expects to offer a pre-school beginning in September 2013 for up to 50 children. "We already have 25 applicants." Chabad will also house its offices there.

Eventually, Rabbi Gansburg predicts, it will be necessary to expand the building.

Of more immediate concern is getting it ready to serve as a Jewish house of worship. That means removing all existing Christian symbols, not the least of which are the front doors, decorated with a stylized cross.

"Those doors gotta change," he said.

Rabbi Daniel Gordis launches his new book The Promise of Israel

Monday, November 5, 2012, 8:00 p.m.

Daniel Gordis, one of Israel's most articulate and passionate voices, and one of contemporary Jewry's leading public intellectuals will speak about his new book The Promise of Israel. In conversation with Rabbi John Moscovitz.

Book selling and signing, refreshments afterward. Admission free with thanks to Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman

"Many of us assume that to be truly free, we must abandon the groups into which we were born and the identities we have inherited. But as Daniel Gordis demonstrates in his book, The Promise of Israel, the State of Israel's remarkable history is proof that identity and freedom can coexist, that it is identity that makes genuine freedom possible."

Sometimes a great notion

Haim Divon, the former Israeli ambassador to Canada, was recently in Toronto to speak to alumni of Hebrew University and others about Israel's long and storied record, since the very early days of the state, of finding meaningful, efficient and creative ways of reaching out to help developing countries in the world.

From 2005 to 2011, Divon was the head of Mashav, Israel's Agency for International Development Co-operation, an arm of the Foreign Ministry.

The program began in 1957 when Israel was itself labouring under severe financial conditions, struggling to provide housing for the hundreds of thousands of immigrants who had found their way to the nascent state and trying to build a sound fiscal, commercial, industrial and agricultural infrastructure for its still uncertain economy.

The essence, brilliance and deep humanity of the program is in the nature of the aid dispatched by the young country: Israel has sent hundreds of experts to advise, build and otherwise assist as and where needed, in the developing world. In addition, it has invited and continues to invite many hundreds more of overseas students from those same developing countries to study and train in Israel in the various disciplines of science, medicine and agriculture that are so vital for the building of a society.

As reported in The CJN, since its inception Mashav has sent thousands of experts, from agronomists to physicians to African, Asian and Latin American nations and invited more than 200,000 individuals from the same countries to study in Israel.

"We were sharing with others. We worked with agents of change to improve societies. It was a basic Zionist notion," Divon told The CJN. According to Guy Sleemann, director for Israel's development mission to Haiti, Israel today has humanitarian development teams, such as the one still providing medical and agricultural aid in Haiti, in some 110 countries around the world.

It is this starkly irrefutable background of innovative, vibrant, caring Israeli humanitarianism that exposes the disgustingly false notions about the Jewish state spread, for example, by members of the Free Gaza Movement, whose rabid rantings and risible ravings about Israel consist of boycott, divestment and sanctions.

One of the movement's co-founders, Greta Berlin, is currently on a speaking tour in Canada. That she recently inadvertently shone a light on her own vile belief that "Zionists ran the Holocaust and the concentration camps" we hope will be inconvenient for the success of her tour.

If the leaders of Gaza would finally adopt the Zionist notion that it is more important to build (Gaza) rather than to destroy (Israel), the Jewish state would help them improve Gazan society too. What a great notion for the Free Gaza Movement to embrace. That would bring true freedom to Gaza and its people.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israel began a year-long celebration of its 40th anniversary, which was to be officially marked in May 1988. The government said it hoped the $10-million festivities would make 1988 Israel's most successful tourist year ever.

Divisive views of Jewish identity

I found there to be a glaring contrast between two articles in the Oct. 4 edition of The CJN. The Perspectives piece, "A battle for the rabbinate, and for Israel's soul," which included an interview with Rabbi David Stav, complained about the narrow, partisan views of those who currently make up Israel's religious establishment. Rabbi Stav's fear is that unless the establishment is reformed, "Israeli society will splinter into pieces." In the column, "Beware of tikkunism and tikkunistas," by Gerald Steinberg complains about the Theodore Adorno Prize being awarded to Prof. Judith Butler by the city of Frankfurt. Butler's criticisms of policies pursued by the Netanyahu government offend Steinberg. I grant that he is entitled to his opinion, just as Butler is entitled to hers. But Steinberg is doubly offended by the fact that Butler grounds her political criticisms in what she takes to be Jewish social values. Steinberg will have none of this. He accuses Butler of not knowing the first thing about Jewish values, which he goes on to define dogmatically. Apparently, either one agrees with Steinberg about what it means to be a Jew or one is not really a Jew. I conclude from this that the problem identified by Rabbi Stav is not restricted to the religious establishment. Narrowly partisan views of Jewish identity and Jewish values threaten to divide us against ourselves, in Israel, in Canada and around the world.

Stephen L. Newman

Israel critic speaks clearly

As an academic, I have come across the turgid writings of highly praised and esteemed feminist/post-modernist Prof. Judith Butler ("Beware of tikkunism and tikkunistas," Oct. 4). In a highly critical review, titled The Professor of Parody, University of Chicago law professor Martha Nussbaum comments, "Butler is a very smart person. In public discussions she proves that she can speak clearly and has a quick grasp of what is said to her. Her written style, however, is ponderous and obscure" (The New Republic online, Feb. 22, 1999). Butler defends her notoriously opaque prose as an exercise in intellectual liberation and creative ambiguity. Yet, we get the full measure of her hypocrisy when we observe that when it comes to vilifying Israel and Zionism, she speaks in lucid, simple language – as she did most recently at the Jewish Museum in Berlin. It is as though there are no nuances or alternative ways of understanding Israel – there is only Butler's uncharacteristically clear demonization of the Jewish state.

Video not cause of violence, murder

Regarding Bert Raphael's letter, "Muslims need tolerance for criticism" (Oct. 4), it seems that once again the video Innocence of Muslims has been elevated to a causative role in the unleashing of riots, violence and murder in the Middle East. The tragic death of the American ambassador, Christopher Stevens, on Sept. 11, appears to have been the result of a well-planned and executed attack on the U.S. embassy in Benghazi, Libya. The video is little more than a red herring, just as the second intifadah was not caused by then-Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount in 2000. Raphael's effort to seemingly lend a measure of equivalence between the riots in Egypt and elsewhere, and the video is disingenuous.

It is true that Jews do not behave in a murderous fashion when we are pilloried in the most vicious terms in the various media. But some Muslims regard any criticism of the Prophet Muhammad as unwelcome and a cause for violent reaction.

Jews, however, do not, as Raphael would suggest, follow "the teachings of their Christian brethren," and turn "the other cheek." (The full quote can be found in Matthew 5:39.) On the contrary, Christianity has followed the teachings of Judaism, where the origin of this quote can be found in Eicha/Lamentations (3:30): "Let one offer his cheek to his smiter, let him be filled with disgrace." Jews no more follow Christianity than does the eruption in the Middle East follow the video, which had been around months in advance of Sept. 11.

Middle East must have democracy

Natan Sharansky reflects upon the Arab Spring

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

About 15 years ago, a prominent Israeli dealing with world affairs told then-MK Natan Sharansky about a "future leader of the Arab world" who "thinks exactly" like Sharansky – a modern and moderate young man who "believes in democracy" in the Middle East. The Israeli offered to fly Sharansky to Paris to meet this future leader – one Bashar Assad, then the son of and today (still) the president of Syria – hoping the two would advance bilateral relations.

Before agreeing to fly to Paris, Sharansky asked if Bashar was going to be democratically elected. "No, of course not. His father [Hafez Assad] is going to appoint him," the interlocutor responded. Sharansky politely declined. Obviously, he could not have known that this ostensible would-be believer in democracy would be massacring his own people a decade-and-a-half later for daring to challenge his rule. But for Sharansky, a leader who was not elected, not seeking to be elected by his people, it was not worth his time.

Arguably the world's most famous former Prisoner of Zion, who spent years in a Soviet prison fighting for his right to immigrate to Israel, Sharansky's belief in democracy is unshakable. While a political hawk, he is one of the few public figures in Israel who fully embraced the Arab Spring, arguing that it is in everybody's interest – emphatically including Israel's – that the people of the Arab world choose their leaders themselves and move toward free, democratic societies.

Many Israeli politicians, especially from the right wing, bemoaned last year's Tahrir Square demonstrations and subsequent fall of then-Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak, which paved the way for the Muslim Brotherhood to win Egypt's parliamentary and presidential elections this year. But Sharansky, 64, insists that Mubarak's dictatorial regime should have ended much earlier.

"It's a pity that it didn't happen 20 years ago," said Sharansky, who today heads the Jewish Agency for Israel. "It had to happen."

Having presaged the fall of the Soviet Union when he crossed the Iron Curtain and came to Israel 26 years ago, Sharansky believes that all dictatorships are doomed to fall sooner or later. "Every dictatorship, however good it is for the West, will be overthrown one day," he said.

His 2004 book, The Case for Democracy, is one of former U.S. president George W. Bush's favorite texts – it served as his foreign policy guide – but Sharansky differed from Bush on one crucial point. "Bush was saying [in 2007], if it's not Mubarak, it will be the Muslim Brotherhood and we don't want the Muslim Brotherhood," Sharansky recalled in a recent interview in his Jerusalem office.

"That is the big mistake of the West. If the only options are either Mubarak or the Muslim Brotherhood, you will get the Muslim Brotherhood. If the only options are Yasser Arafat or Hamas, the answer is Hamas. If you understand that [autocratic regimes will not last] forever, that they have to fall, then it has to be said: the sooner it will happen, the better."

Opponents of the Arab Spring initially believed that the despots of the Middle East could defy it, and go on as if nothing happened. But it would have been smarter to accept from the beginning that the status quo could not continue, he argues. "The later they will fall the more the people [in the Arab world] will hate you, and the smaller the opportunity for any liberal democracy to work," Sharansky said.

The free world often forgets that dictators like

Mubarak and Assad were subjugating their people. The more the West supports such regimes, the more it will be hated by the people once the regimes, inevitably, fall apart, he added.

"The main message of the Arab Spring, even with all the other negative things which happened afterwards, was: now the people will be deciding who will be their leaders. That is a great opportunity. Why? Because whoever is in power, they depend on the will of the people. That means that whoever is in power will have to deal with the problems of these people. Mubarak and Assad built their power on fear and physical control. The moment we have these new leaders who are dependent on the anger – but also on the satisfaction – of the street, they have to deal with these problems."

The new Egypt, for example, has bigger and more urgent problems than Israel, Sharansky reasons. "They [Egypt's leaders] can speak as much as they want about their hatred for Israel or Zionism or Jews or whatever, their main problem is what to do with the economy that is falling apart, with housing which is not existing and with how to feed tens of millions of people without jobs," Sharansky said.

The free world should support the budding democ-ratships that promised stability but didn't care for the people has been helping the Muslim Brotherhood gain steam. Sharansky suggested.

Roughly 18 months later, the Muslim Brotherhood is ruling Egypt, and in Jordan it recently started organizing mass demonstrations against the king, leading some observers to predict a Tahrir-style revolution there too. Yet Sharansky is adamant that democracy is, and remains, the only way forward.

"That's the problem with the free world: we're not learning anything. At each stage in history, we do the same. We're looking for which dictator in this awful chaos will be more sympathetic toward us," he said. "The free world has to understand: We cannot decide for these people to be a democracy or not. We cannot guarantee the survival of the dictators. We cannot guarantee the creation of free society." Therefore, Sharansky insists that the West support Egypt's young democracy – which needs the West's help to survive – but should tie all aid to Egypt to the strengthening of a free society there and the acceptance of peaceful coexistence with Israel.

Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood president, Mohammed Morsi, while certainly no Zionist, has publicly indicated his commitment to honor the 1979 peace treaty with Israel. He sent a friendly letter to his Israeli counterpart Shimon Peres (though he later denied sending it) and appointed a new ambassador to Tel Aviv, after the post had been vacant for months. Morsi understands, it seems, that at least for now his country has other worries than picking a fight with Israel.

"The more the government depends on its own people, the less dangerous it is to us," Sharansky posited. "Because the government depends on its own people, it has to deliver goods to the people. If you believe that for the Egyptian people it is more important to kill Jews than not to die from hunger, then you cannot explain why this revolution happened. Because when the people went on the street there was not a word about killing Jews or hating Israel. Well, there was sometimes 'Mubarak is an agent of Israel,' but that's about it. It was all about, 'We want to have a normal life, we don't want to live in fear, we want to have jobs' – that was their message."

Hearing Sharansky making the case for democracy in the Middle East, one might assume he'd be unhappy about the way the current government has been dealing with the recent developments in the Arab world. In fact, Sharansky compliments Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on his handling of the situation. "Netanyahu is right in formulating the conditions which are absolutely unacceptable from our point of view and should not be acceptable for the free world if they want to cooperate with this regime," Sharansky said, speaking of Egypt.

While he is in favor of the free world working together with Morsi, the West should clearly state that fighting terror in Sinai and keeping the peace agreements with Israel are the very basic conditions that Cairo has to fulfill for any kind of support and cooperation.

"We have to think about our dignity, about our interests and power. We have to formulate, in a very cool way, the minimal threshold of what we believe should be included in the relations with this government."

Jerusalem is not obligated to declare its passionate love for the Muslim Brotherhood, Sharansky said, but it should also not make the error of wishing back Mubarak. "I don't believe in a new Middle East based on dictators."

ratization of the Middle East, but any aid should be contingent on the development of a free civil society, he suggested.

"It will not happen in one day, but more and more governments at this moment depend on the will of their people, and will have to cooperate with the free world in trying to solve their problems through helping to build institutions of civil society," he said.

Sharansky, a former interior minister and deputy prime minister, will defend democracy no matter the outcome, regardless of whether moderates or extremists win at the ballot box. In February 2011, before the Muslim Brotherhood had come to power in Egypt, he had hailed the Arab Spring as "the moment to try to put our trust in freedom."

In a newspaper interview at the time, he said that the free world was lucky in two respects. "First, that what happened in Egypt happened when the Muslim Brotherhood is not yet strong enough [to sweep into power]. The longer there is dictatorship, the longer the free world helps to destroy all democratic dissent, the stronger the Muslim Brotherhood becomes... So it is good that this is all happening now in Egypt when the Muslim Brotherhood is not strong enough." The West's support for dic-

Building bridges through unexpected kinships

Lately I have been pointing people to an intriguing column I came upon about marriage and Jewish women. Written by a young Orthodox woman at Yeshiva University and published in the New York Times, the column considers the gulf that the author believes sets in between married and unmarried female friends.

The subtext – which is not deeply buried – is the ambivalent mix of yearning for and wariness of marriage, and the struggle to understand why some women remain single, despite their desires find a life mate.

The author, Avital Chizhik, muses about these matters while sitting in a café and working on a term paper about marriage in the work of British writer Virginia Woolf. Chizhik cannot help but overhear a conversation taking place at a table just behind her about precisely those matters. Two unseen young women fret about why they have not yet met “the one.” Chizhik identifies with the bits of conversation that waft toward her: the brother who grew a beard, young men who are looking for more religious women, what happens on the “men’s side” of a wedding reception.

Certain she knows just where these women come from – Jewish high schools, religious girls with secular education and ambition – she’s startled when she finally catches a glimpse of them: two women, her own age, in hijabs. Chizhik is struck by the commonalities: modest garb, longing for, yet wary of, marriage, connection to an ancient tradition and a regulated way of life, but with legs in the modern world (even if covered).

The column, in its reaching across boundaries to find unsought, unexpected, yet resonant connections, brought to mind a scene in a movie I once saw that also evoked strong connections for many viewers. In She’s Gotta Have It, directed by African-American filmmaker Spike Lee, several accomplished black women sit in a Brooklyn living room and talk about the problem of finding a man who is their professional, social and intellectual equal. They wanted to marry men from their own community. But, they complain, successful black men married out of the community. The women in the scene analyzed their problem. Perhaps they were simply too picky. Perhaps they should not insist on marrying a professional equal, but simply look for a good man from their community.

For Jewish viewers, the film resonated deeply. So many single women commented that if you replaced the black women in the scene with Jewish women, the conversation would be the same. At the time the movie was released – the mid-1980s – the intermarriage rate was much higher for Jewish men than for Jewish women. Unmarried Jewish women who were educated and accomplished were often told that they set their sights too high. Many expressed a strong and unexpected kinship with the women depicted in Lee’s film.

They felt this connection, which had to do with ties to community and tradition.

yearning for love, and wanting to be valued, at a moment when the Jewish and African American communities were often at odds with one another, especially in Brooklyn. In a similar fashion, Chizhik felt a tug of kinship with these young Muslim women whose community is often at odds with her own.

Readers’ comments on Chizhik’s column on the New York Times website were revealing. Many were written by self-identified Jews and Muslims who were moved by the vignette and by the sensitive and lyrical writing. A significant number of postings took issue with religion itself as a system that restricts and demeans the lives of its followers (especially women). But other commentators noted that finding in religion a source of abiding, if complicated, meaning is what Chizhik describes as uniting her with the women she overhears in the café. And in following the cyberlife of the column, I noted that it had been posted approvingly on both Jewish and Islamic websites.

As an educator at a diverse university, I am often struck by the way students reach across divides they had once believed impassable, seeing points of commonality in another community’s ways of being, doing and thinking. Especially for women negotiating modern options while contending with ingrained social dynamics in their communities, these kinships can be enlightening and fortifying. And they can build bridges.

Jews need rabbis, not chiefs

Matti Friedman is an Israeli journalist and author. David Stav is an Israeli rabbi, yeshiva head and the current chairman of Tzohar, the organization of moderate Orthodox rabbis in Israel.

Last month, Friedman published an interview with Rabbi Stav in The Times of Israel and republished in The C/N. He asked this pertinent question: “I grew up in Toronto in a largely religious neighborhood that was part of a thriving Jewish community. There was no rabbinate. The same goes for anywhere else in the Diaspora. Why does Israel need one?”

Rabbi Stav seems to aspire to the post of Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel when it becomes vacant next year. Though he’s critical of the way the present incumbent and his Sephardi counterpart stifle religious life in Israel, he’s in favour of the institution and asserts that the Jewish state needs a religious hierarchy as “an elementary common denominator around which the society can unite.”

He chooses to ignore the fact that Israel’s Chief Rabbinate is the creation of the British mandatory powers in Palestine, modelled on the one in Britain, where the chief rabbi is a kind of Jewish counterpart to the Archbishop of Canterbury. Until the middle of the last century, he was called “the very reverend” and wore an Anglican clerical collar. Nowadays, like several bishops, he sits in the House of Lords.

The institution has little to do with Jewish tradition. Although there have always been leading rabbis around the world, their authority was invariably founded on their personalities and sustained by the depth of their learning. It had little to do with the office they held.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

Tzohar promises to change Israel’s Chief Rabbinate by making conversion easier and marriage ceremonies more acceptable to secular Israelis. Its chairman points to the more than one million Israelis, mainly immigrants from the former Soviet Union and their offspring, whose Jewish status is being questioned by the current hierarchy. And one-third of secular Israeli couples marry abroad in civil ceremonies to escape the punishing bureaucracy of the rabbinate at home.

Rabbi Stav admits that Israeli rabbinic officials don’t minister to the religious needs of Jews. He told Friedman that they treat Jews “like the income tax department does, as people who owe us” and blames the secular political parties for selling out to the haredim in exchange for cynical support on other matters. The avowed aim of Tzohar is to de-politicize the Chief Rabbinate and restore its integrity and flexibility as it was in the days of its first incumbent, Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook.

The intention may be genuine and noble, but it’s unrealistic, because every central rabbinic authority, even if less rigid, has proven to be harmful to normative Judaism.

The main reason why the United States is the most religious country in the western world is because Christians don’t have an established church, nor do Jews tolerate ecclesiastical hierarchies. Americans know that faith thrives in a climate of pluralism and diversity.

All shades of Judaism, including Orthodoxy, benefit from it. Yet it seems that even this moderate Israeli exponent wants a hierarchy, probably in the vain hope that in its quest for hegemony, the state-sponsored institution will keep out non-Orthodox Jewish movements. Hunger for power in the guise of moderation and in the name of Jewish unity seems to overrule the alleged commitment to Jewish values.

An Israeli Chief Rabbinate, even if it’s more lenient than at present, will continue to satisfy the craving for a franchise on Judaism at the expense of the growth and depth seen in America, where – unlike in Britain and some European countries – rabbis have to make their case on merit, not through administrative rule.

Orthodox rabbinic power in Israel disenfranchises women – i.e., more than half the country’s Jewish population. If Rabbi Stav wants to earn the respect of the Israeli mainstream, he must commit himself to equal rights for women and their full recognition in all religious matters. He’ll also have to acknowledge, however grudgingly, that the non-Orthodox streams deserve equal rights in Israeli society because of their capacity to enrich Jewish life – just as in the Diaspora.

A good way to achieve this is to heed the implied challenge in Friedman’s reference to his Toronto experience and to seek to abolish this corrupting and traditionally questionable office. As the head of a yeshiva, Rabbi Stav should know that Jews need rabbis, not chiefs.

'Red lines' debate underscores tension over Iran

According to a recent Obama administration communiqué, the United States and Israel, its chief ally in the Middle East, are in "full agreement" that Iran cannot be permitted to acquire a nuclear arsenal. This White House press release was issued after Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu addressed the United Nations and declared that a "red line" must be drawn to deter and limit Iran's ability to purify uranium to bomb-grade enrichment. Beyond concurring on this fundamental principle, Washington and Jerusalem are at odds over Netanyahu's demand to issue an ultimatum to Iran.

To Israel's disappointment, the United States is clearly unwilling to make that kind of public commitment. Nor is any other country, including Canada. In short, no one wants to be dragged into a war.

Netanyahu has expressed confidence that U.S. President Barack Obama will not allow Iran to build nuclear weapons. But with Israel threatening to launch a pre-emptive strike on Iran, he and Obama have been unable to agree on a timetable that would trigger a military response to destroy or disable Iran's nuclear facilities. Given the imperatives of geography and the differences in military capabilities, Israel's defence minister, Ehud Barak, has noted that Israeli and U.S. clocks are ticking at different times.

Netanyahu, who recently warned that Iran is six to seven months away from attaining a nuclear weapons capability, argues that the Iranian government, having already enriched a stockpile of uranium to 20 per cent purity, is inexorably reaching what Barak has succinctly described as a "zone of immunity."

This is a reference to the point beyond which Israel would no longer be able to stop Iran from enriching uranium to 90 per cent purity and thereby assembling an atomic device.

Netanyahu, who swept to power in 2009 partly on the strength of an election campaign promise to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions, claims that Iran will only back down if "red lines" are drawn.

"We know that the Iranians see red," Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, has said. "We know they can discern the colour red. We know that the redder the line, the lesser the chance that they will pass it."

This burning matter has caused considerable friction between Israel and the United States. It surfaced acrimoniously on Aug. 24 when Netanyahu reportedly told the U.S. ambassador to Israel, Dan Shapiro, that the Obama administration has not displayed sufficient clarity on Iran. The verbal exchange was witnessed by U.S. Congressman Mike Rogers, who said it had been "very tense" and "agitated."

Shapiro dismissed his account as "a very silly story." But on Sept. 11, about two weeks before Netanyahu's appearance at the United Nations, he criticized the United States for refusing to set clear "red lines" that would touch off the bombing of Iran's nuclear sites. Netanyahu also claimed that the Obama administration has no "moral right" to restrain Israel from striking Iran.

To some degree, Netanyahu's comments were a response to a statement made by U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who said, "We're not setting deadlines." Leon Panetta, the U.S. secretary of defence, joined the debate. Asserting that "a bunch of little red lines" would not determine American policy, he claimed that the United States would have a year to respond should Iran decide to build a nuclear weapon.

Rightly or wrongly, U.S. officials contend that the United States has the means to detect, and prevent, Iran from passing that threshold. They believe that Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has yet to make a decision as to whether Iran will even build a militarized nuclear program. Iran says its nuclear program is designed for peaceful purposes – a claim hotly disputed by Israel and the United States.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

Before resorting to brute force, the Obama administration wants to give diplomacy and international economic sanctions far more time to work.

As Israeli Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz has admitted, sanctions have exacted a heavy toll on Iran, having affected its vital oil exports, degraded its currency and set off the first street protests in Tehran in three years. But with Khamenei has declared that Iran will not be swayed by the biting sanctions.

Six world powers – the United States, France, Britain, Russia, China and Germany – have engaged Iran in three rounds of talks since April in an attempt to defuse the crisis. But with Iran having steadfastly refused to halt enrichment, the objective of the entire exercise, the negotiations have faltered, prompting the United States, France and Britain to warn the Iranians that time is running out for a diplomatic solution.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Susan Rice, has accused Iran of bad faith, saying its approach is "to deny, deceive and distract."

Netanyahu, in his recent speech to the United Nations, levelled an identical accusation. As he put it, "Iran uses negotiations to buy time to advance its (nuclear) program." Sanctions, he acknowledged, have had an impact: "The Iranian economy has been hit hard. But we must face the truth that sanctions have not stopped Iran's nuclear drive."

He added, "At this late hour, there is only one way to peacefully prevent Iran from getting atomic bombs, and that's by placing a clear red line on Iran's nuclear weapons program."

Red lines, he claimed, do not lead to war. "Red lines prevent war."

Despite his insistence on imposing "red lines" on Iran, Netanyahu has not precisely spelled out when Iran's nuclear program would constitute a casus belli and prompt an Israeli attack. But on Oct. 2, following reports that the United States had given Israel assurances it will not tolerate an Iranian breakout to nuclear arms, Netanyahu suggested that the deadline for a military strike has been pushed forward to mid-2013.

Barak, nonetheless, continues to insist that Israel must act before Iran's nuclear program becomes impervious to bombing raids, and that Israel cannot rely on outside powers to rein in Iran.

Barak's assertion, underpinned by the assumption that the United States is loathe to embroil itself in a war with Iran, suggests that Israel may have to deal with the problem unilaterally. But Israeli public opinion opposes a pre-emptive strike, and most ministers in Netanyahu's cabinet prefer a diplomatic solution, if one is still possible.

Certainly, many of Israel's supporters in the Diaspora are wary of the prospect of Israel acting unilaterally. Ron Lauder, the president of the World Jewish Congress, has warned that an Israeli strike without American assistance would be disastrous.

The Americans may yet use force to deal with Iran's nuclear program. The U.S. ambassador in Israel has said that the United States has made the "necessary preparations" to hit Iran. One of his predecessors, Martin Indyk, has gone further: "I'm afraid that 2013 is going to be a year when we're going to have a military confrontation with Iran."

The commander of Iran's Revolutionary Guards Corps, Gen. Mohammad Ali Jafari, has also sounded a dire warning, saying that a war with Israel is inevitable. His predecessor, Mohsen Rezai, has predicted that 10,000 Israelis will be killed should a war break out.

This much is certain. Every "red line" will be crossed if external force is deployed to eliminate or cripple Iran's nuclear program.

Israeli agency helps the developing world

Former ambassador to Canada headed Mashav

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel was a poor country in the 1950s, struggling to feed its people and fend off threats from its Arab enemies.

Yet, during this austere period of its formative history, Israel's Agency for International Development Co-operation, known as Mashav, dispatched a cadre of experts to the developing world and invited thousands of overseas students to its universities to take part in training programs in a variety of fields.

"We were sharing with others," said Haim Divon, who headed Mashav, an arm of the Foreign Ministry, from 2005 to 2011. "It was a basic Zionist notion."

Divon, who was Israel's ambassador to Canada before being appointed to his position at Mashav, delivered these comments at a Canadian Friends of Hebrew

University function last week.

A graduate of the Hebrew University, he spoke about Mashav's role in bringing know-how and expertise to the developing world and the university's contribution to that objective.

Created in 1957, when many Israelis were still dependent on care packages from relatives abroad, Mashav began as a modest program steeped in the Jewish philosophy of tikun olam, repairing the world.

Dedicated to promoting sustainable development in Africa, Asia and Latin America, Mashav grew rapidly, like Israel itself.

"We worked with agents of change to improve societies," said Divon, who is currently Israel's ambassador to the Netherlands.

Since its establishment, Mashav has sent thousands of experts, from agronomists to physicians, to African, Asian and Latin American nations, and invited more than 200,000 Africans, Asians and Latin Americans to Israel to participate in its array of training programs.

A considerable number of the experts were Hebrew University graduates, Divon noted.

Lovemore Nkhata Malunga, a citizen of Malawi, spent about two years in Israel completing a master's degree at the Hebrew University's faculty of agriculture under the auspices of Mashav.

Malunga, a soft-spoken man currently studying for a PhD in food science at the University of Manitoba, used the knowledge he acquired in Israel to revolutionize nutrition in Malawi, one of Africa's poorest, least developed countries.

A landlocked nation in southeast Africa with a population of nearly 14 million, Malawi is dependent on foreign aid and suffers from a high infant mortality rate.

Not too long ago, Malunga said, 20 per cent of Malawian children died before they reached the age of five.

"We can't produce enough food to feed ourselves," he said.

But drawing on his education in Israel, Malunga set up a nationwide program in villages to launch the process of eradicating malnutrition in Malawi.

He said his studies at the Hebrew University were a turning point in his life, teaching him that a country as lacking in natural resources as Israel can manage, and even thrive, in the modern world.

Roma centre distances itself from anti-Israel protest

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The main representative body of Canada's Roma community doesn't want its members to be labelled anti-Israel.

Toronto's Roma Community Centre (RCC) board distanced itself last week from anti-Israel groups planning to protest a reception for Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney, who will be honoured by the Canadian Friends of Haifa University (CFHU) on Nov. 4 at the Fairmount Royal York hotel.

Jason Kenney

The university will confer an honorary doctorate on Kenney for his "steadfast position against antisemitism, racism and intolerance and, in particular, for his solidarity with the State of Israel and his condemnation of Israel Apartheid Week" at its annual Mount Carmel Dinner, the university said.

Proceeds from the dinner will go to establish a "Jason Kenney Holocaust Education Fund" at Haifa U.

Earlier this year Kenney ran afoul of the Roma community after the government first considered, then passed, Bill C-31, the immigration law that, among other things, allows for easier extradition of failed refugee applicants to Canada.

In April, Kenney said he believed many claimants from Hungary – specifically Roma, also known pejoratively as Gypsies – were making false refugee claims and abusing Canada's refugee system.

An April 22 report in the National Post cited statistics from the Immigration Review Board showing a spike in Roma claims from 2010 to 2012. The story quoted Kenney as saying that Canada had been trying to educate the Roma about how to properly apply to immigrate here.

Calls to Kenney's office for comment were not returned by The C/N's deadline.

The Roma Community Centre had initially been listed as one of the parties slated to protest Kenney, along with other virulently anti-Israel groups such as Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, Independent Jewish Voices, Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid, International Jewish Anti-Zionist Network and Jews Opposing Zionism.

But last Thursday, RCC executive director Gina Csanyi-Robah withdrew her organization from that mass protest to stand alone at its own demonstration to symbolically show that it's not anti-Israel, yet still opposes Kenney's views on immigration.

In an Oct. 11 statement, her group declared that it has "specific reasons" for its opposition to Haifa U giving an award to Kenney. It said while there are many other organizations protesting the minister, some are too controversial to be associated with.

Instead, the RCC "decided to protest the award independently, so that its purpose is not confused with those of other groups," Csanyi-Robah said.

Asked whether her organization was anti-Israel, she said that while she couldn't speak for everyone, Roma have "historically felt a very close connection to the Jewish community" and that she personally wanted to see a peaceful end to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and a two-state solution.

"Our ashes were mingled in the ovens," Csanyi-Robah said, quoting a Roma saying about how close both peoples became as a result of their shared horrors at the hands of the Nazis.

"We are anti-Nazi, anti-Jobbik, anti-racist, we absolutely oppose antisemitism, and support the safety and well-being of all people," she said. "Mr. Kenney has called Roma refugees bogus, but has remained silent about the resurgence of neo-Nazi political agendas in Hungary – the Jobbik political party and its paramilitary allies have vowed to continue the work that the Nazis began. Mr. Kenney should recognize the danger posed to both Roma and Jews by the extreme-right Jobbik Party and has not done so."

Csanyi-Robah said Roma who are being returned from Canada to Hungary face intimidation, violence and even death.

"Jobbik wants to put Roma into 'public order' camps. Forced-labour work camps became a reality for Roma in Hungary this past January 2012," she said.

Reports of heightened xenophobia in Hungary, particularly against Jews and Roma, have increased since 2008.

Bernie Farber, ex-CEO of the now-defunct Canadian Jewish Congress, has had a long working relationship with Csanyi-Robah and her centre, and had recently been painted in local news reports as an anti-Israel activist because of his affiliation with the group and its previous listing on the anti-Kenney protest's web page.

Kids at heart of Zareinu fashion fundraiser

Escada to showcase 2013 collection at the show

Cara Stern

Special to The CJN

Zareinu is gearing up for its annual fashion show, raising money for the school and treatment centre for children with physical and developmental challenges.

Now in its ninth year, the fundraiser draws fashion enthusiasts and designers alike, bringing the latest fashion to its audience.

This year, international fashion house Escada will be featured at the event, with one show dedicated specifically to this designer.

"We're very excited that they've recognized us and decided to partner with Zareinu," said Stacy Markin, event co-chair. "It gives us tremendous credibility that an organization that is so well-known and international has recognized Zareinu and decided to showcase their 2013 collection [at the show]."

She called this event the first time Escada has done a show for the layperson. "This is something people in the fashion industry and celebrities would normally see."

Additionally, it's the first time this new "resort collection" will be shown on a runway in Canada, said Jeanne Beker, Canadian fashion reporter and host of the fashion show.

Renee Rosenzweig, another co-chair for the show, along with Esti Cohen, said the show is incredibly successful because people like to associate themselves with glamour, which they are sure to find at this event. However, the goal – apart from raising money – is to open dialogue about special needs.

"Special needs is sort of hush-hush, and it would bring an openness to the cause," Rosenzweig said. "By putting on a calibre show like this, we're bringing special-needs kids out and people will be willing to talk more about it."

Kids model latest fashions at last year's Zareinu fashion fundraiser.

The night will feature two shows: one with professional models in adult fashion, such as Escada, and another has children taking their turns down the runway, wearing fashions from brands like Gap and Baby Gap.

Markin said the children's fashion show is particularly special.

"They get down the runway by walking or rolling," she said. "However, they get down the runway, it's an awesome sight to see. There's not a dry eye in the house."

Many of the children are growing up with physical disabilities that, without Zareinu's help, could mean a life without walking. That's what makes this show so special and unique, Markin said.

"These are kids who the parents never thought would be walking down the runway in a fashion show," she said.

Markin's own daughter is one of these children. Doctors told the family she would never be able walk or develop fine motor skills. Now she can walk, and Markin credits Zareinu for improving her daughter's life.

Beker said she decided to get involved with the show after a visit to Zareinu and a first-hand look at the work it does.

"I went to the school and was totally blown away by the level of compassion and caring, and the tiny miracles that you see unfolding on a constant basis," she said. "It was just the most magical, wonderful, inspiring place. It honestly kind of changed me."

Markin recalled one year when a boy was walking with his two siblings and he fell. One was helping him move his walker down the runway, but ended up going a bit too fast, and the child fell flat on the floor. Therapists jumped up, ready to help him, and he continued walking, determined to finish his mission.

"The entire audience stood to the standing ovation until the child continued all the way down and all the way back," she said.

Rosenzweig said kids tend to fall a lot at the beginning, and it can be quite scary for onlookers. "If he falls, the pound is like earth-shattering," she said. "You feel like he hurt himself, but he was so happy."

It's these kinds of stories that keep Zareinu's fashion show alive, Markin said. "They never focus on what the children can't do. They just focus on the strengths and what the children can do," she said.

The money raised at the event will go to Zareinu, helping the school subsidize fees for families in need.

Shul's name, logo chosen by congregants

"The paradigm is a very different one," she said.

The synagogue is taking the approach of building its policies and traditions through its congregation.

"Decisions and policies are now being invented, are now being imagined together with the congregation," Rabbi Goldstein said. "It's very much a crowd-sourcing synagogue."

Even the shul's name and logo were chosen by the congregants. And after the High Holiday services, the synagogue sent a survey to people who attended to find out which parts of the services they found meaningful and which parts they would like to change for next time.

Unlike most synagogues, this one has no board. Instead, there's a leadership team working together in a non-hierarchical fashion. Each of the eight members has his or her own portfolio, but they all work together to promote the synagogue and run the programming.

Additionally, instead of committees, there are "task forces." Those involved on a task force take on short projects, and when it's done, they move on to another project entirely.

a story and a potluck dinner. The other is for adults and includes a one-hour musical meditation to welcome in Shabbat.

She described the shul's services as very traditional, especially considering they are based in the Reform movement. Services are mostly in Hebrew, and they do a full, silent Amidah with full repetition in the morning service.

However, they bring out the drums and dance as the sun sets during Neilah, the concluding service on Yom Kippur.

The first High Holiday services took place at Trinity St. Paul's United Church and Centre for Faith, Justice and the Arts.

"It was gorgeous and very spiritual," said Rabbi Goldstein.

She borrowed a Torah from Am Shalom Synagogue in Barrie, Ont.

"[It was] a kind of 'let's help the newest little shul in town' from a former 'little new shul' that now is thriving," she said.

City Shul is already showing signs of thriving. The Hebrew school is running, with 40 kids currently enrolled from senior kindergarten to pre-bar or bat mitzvah.

Jonathan Wyman, a member of the leadership team, said he and his wife were really enthused when he found out Rabbi Goldstein would be starting regular services.

"We have daughters who are approaching bat mitzvah age, and wanted to be sure they were involved in a shul and a community," he said.

He tried attending synagogues in both downtown and midtown Toronto, but never felt as comfortable as he does with Rabbi Goldstein.

"Our personal inclination is more intellectual and less traditionally liturgical," he said. "She's very left-wing politically and right-wing traditionally. It's a lot closer to the Conservative services that many of us grew up with."

The synagogue attracts people from all walks of life, and Rabbi Goldstein said that ultimately, they're trying to reach anybody who wants to be reached.

So far, in just a few months, 140 member units, or households, have answered the call and joined the synagogue. Some are Orthodox Jews, others are interfaith couples, spiritual searchers and even people with no Jewish background, she said.

"We have a lot of empty nesters who have moved downtown for the condos," Rabbi Goldstein said, adding that the shul's programming attracts a wide range of people. For example, each month, there will be two Friday night services. One is for families with children, with

TWO JEWISH HEROES

A Hero – Wilfrid Canter

Advertorial

Wilfrid Canter

A Hero – Wilfrid Canter happens to be a Canadian, Jewish & a Machalnik. I went overseas with Wilf in 1942 and we kept in touch. The last I heard from him was a letter inviting me to meet him in London at Buckingham Palace where he was to receive the D.F.M. The letter came back "Missing." He never made it and I did not hear the rest of the story until many years later. - A link to the past, Mickey Heller.

His Bomber was shot down over Stuttgart in April 1943 and he was the only survivor of his crew. His leg was broken as he jumped out of the plane and he lay in hiding for nine days on the ground. A German family took pity on him and fed him during that time until the resistance smuggled him out of Germany to Switzerland, Gibraltar, and England before returning home to Canada.

After a month's rest he came back to England to resume bombing missions. In May 1944 his plane was shot down again and he managed to parachute to safety but was captured by the Germans near Dusseldorf. He was interrogated at length by the Gestapo. He was one of the organizers of a botched escape plan of captured pilots who were later moved east. Canter escaped in transit and managed to connect with an English unit and eventually to England where he was awarded the D.F.M. by King George. In 1945 he returned to Canada.

He arrived in Israel on Aug. 5th, 1948 with the first volunteer pilots and joined the 103 Squadron in Ramat David. He flew "Dakota" planes primarily on supply missions to units that were surrounded by Egyptian forces in Sodom which were accessible only by air. He was one of five Jewish Canadian pilots with World War 11 experience who served in the Israeli Air Force.

On Oct. 24, 1948, shortly before midnight, he took off from Sde Dov in Tel Aviv toward Sodom with supplies. Ten minutes after take off, his right engine caught fire. He redirected, in an attempt to reach the Tel Nof base for an emergency landing. The plane blew up and crashed, all the crew were killed, including Canter. He was brought to rest at the military cemetery in Rehovot.

Wilf Canter's name has been inscribed on the War Memorial erected by the Jewish War Veterans, Toronto Post at the Lipa Green Centre.

A Hero –Somer James

A Hero –Somer James who happens to be a Canadian and Jewish and served in the Merchant Marine. The only one in the Allied Forces in World War 11 who has been awarded two medals, in one day, for bravery in two separate actions. The medals are displayed in the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa.

He was an ordinary Canadian seaman who accomplished an extraordinary feat on Nov. 5th, 1943. Somer James won two medals for bravery for singlehandedly saving his ship.

The sun was just rising over Torre Anigiatria, a port southeast of Naples Italy, when German bombers descended on allied shipping. The port was of strategic importance because the allies could unload massive quantities of supplies and equipment they needed to drive the Germans out of Italy.

Somer James' ship offered choice prey. Loaded with ammunition, the Empire Lightening was moored to a dock piled high with octane fuel when bombs began to find their targets. One struck the fuel, setting it ablaze and threatening both the Lightening and other freighters moored fore and aft. The ship could be saved only by a careful combination of dropping some of its lines and doubling others, so it could be manoeuvred away from the fire.

The captain called for volunteers. Amidst the pandemonium only Somer James, who was not yet 22 years old stepped up. He donned a heavy jacket and lifebelt and went on deck alone. With the captain shouting instructions down at him from the bridge, with fire raging alongside and with high explosives beneath his feet, he ran the length of the ship. From one mooring point to another he did his best to handle the massive hemp lines alone. The entire operation lasted about three hours, but in the end, he managed to get the ship out of harms way, its sides scorched by fire.

Yet, he didn't stop at that. Once the Lightening was secured, he helped move a number of barges loaded with dangerous cargo that had also caught fire.

The action later won him both the British Empire Medal and the Lloyd's Medal for bravery, an unusual double honour. While 29 other Canadian merchant sailors won the B.E.M for bravery during W.W.11, and some won the Lloyd Medal, none received both awards for the same event.

A soft-spoken pacifist with sparkling blue eyes, he was an academic at heart. Largely self-taught he completed only grade 11 at Harbord Collegiate, yet he was deeply intellectual and visited the library often. When war broke out, he was adamantly opposed to armed conflict and could not bear the thought of pulling a trigger on anyone. Instead in 1940 this pensive Jewish teenager from Toronto took a train ride to Montreal to see whether he could join the merchant navy; it would determine his fate for the next five years. He found a Greek steamer, the first of 12 ships he served aboard in the Battle of the Atlantic.

It was the war's longest theatre of war and the costliest. One in seven people died in the line of duty, their ships and their valuable cargo sent to the bottom by the German U-boats and surface raiders and sometimes because of collision while in convoy. Of the 12,000 Canadians who served, more than 1600 lost their lives

For the dangers, the job suited Somer. "It saved me from certain actions" he once said. I did not want to get involved with killing people, shooting them with guns from far away, and getting involved with anything like that.

Contrary to common belief, merchant sailors do it for the money.

Somer James

In 1949, the year that Somer James joined, the average monthly pay rate for a seaman in the merchant navy was $55.00 compared with $123.00 for a sailor in the Royal Canadian Navy. Until later in the war, merchant seamen who were forced to abandon ship even had their pay stopped.

A Link to the Past – While they were teen-agers Somer James and Mickey Heller attended University Ave. Shul junior services on Saturday mornings.

Somer James' name has been inscribed on the War Memorial erected by the Jewish War Veterans, Toronto Post at the Lipa Green Centre.

Former CJC leader:

'Like all friends, we can have differences of opinion'

He said attempts to portray either himself or the Canadian Roma community at large as anti-Israel or anti-Zionist were "absurd."

He said he'd assisted the RCC in finding lawyers to help look at and challenge the government's new immigration laws, but that was the extent of his role with the organization.

Farber, who will attend the university's gala event as a guest, said he has a "deep and abiding respect" for Kenney's stances on Israel and antisemitism.

"On those issues, we stand shoulder to shoulder, and I consider him a friend. But like all friends, we can have differences of opinion on some issues," Bill C-31 being one such item, he said.

Farber added that he felt Kenney was being "very hard on the Roma" and that many respected representatives of the Jewish community are in agreement. Earlier this year the Toronto Board of Rabbis and Elie Wiesel, among others, had urged the minister to reconsider the legislation.

While Csanyi-Robah calls Farber a "true friend" to her community, the former head of Congress said he doesn't support her call for Haifa U to retract its honouring of Kenney.

"I believe that the Roma Community Centre has the right to engage in whatever advocacy they feel best helps their cause within the bounds of civility and the law," he said. "I respect and fully support [Kenney's] strong advocacy on behalf of Israel and his fight against antisemitism. That is why he is being honoured. I strongly support Haifa University as the most diverse and pluralistic university in the Middle East. I am attending the dinner for all those reasons."

But the centre doesn't feel Kenney deserves this award and is chastising any Jewish community members who support the dinner, Csanyi-Robah said.

"This is an even more sensitive issue for the RCC than any other Canadian group, particularly in light of the establishment of a Holocaust education fund in Kenney's name."

"[He] continues to blatantly turn a blind eye to the 'other' victims of the Holocaust who are witnessing history repeating itself," she said.

It's estimated that anywhere from 500,000 to two million Roma were murdered by the Nazis during the Holocaust.

"How would Jews [supporting] the Canadian Friends of Haifa University feel with a member of the Nazi party in... positions of power in their neighbourhoods?" Csanyi-Robah asked, referring to the situation in Hungary now, where members of the Jobbik Party now hold 47 seats in parliament and numerous mayoralities in towns with high concentrations of Hungarian Roma.

"Kenney and the Hungarian government remain notably silent about the growing neo-Nazi threat in Hungary," she said.

"The world's historical collective memory did not include us Roma as Holocaust victims – it is now time to include and acknowledge our community."

Charity aids chronically ill kids

Children's charity Aaron's Apple will host its second annual Spin-o-thon fundraiser on Oct. 21, raising money for children who need medication not covered by OHIP.

What started as a small fundraiser at Walmart has turned into a charity that's making an impact on the lives of its recipients. Since its inception just two years ago, the charity has raised a total of almost $200,000.

Still a few days away from the event, the organization is set to surpass its initial goal of raising $20,000 to help children with chronic diseases who do not have the funds to cover their treatment.

It all started when Aaron Maresky was seven years old. He had severe stomach pains and was taken to the hospital. After three months in the hospital with a diagnosis of severe Crohn's disease, the medical team found a medicine that worked. Unfortunately, Aaron needed an infusion every six to eight weeks, and OHIP does not cover it.

In total, his medicine costs the family $40,000 every year. Thankfully for them, his family has insurance that covers this. However, Aaron and his family realized that not all families have such extensive coverage. Therefore, together, they started a charity to raise money for chronically ill children in need of financial assistance.

"A big reason why he has been doing it is he wants to turn a negative situation into a positive one," said Mandy Maresky, Aaron's mother. "It was really Aaron who started it."

Often, when Aaron would go to the hospital to receive an infusion, he would use his allowance to donate money and gifts to families in need. Eventually, he came to the decision that he wanted to start his own charity.

Aaron is now 11, and has been truly amazing in spreading the word and building the charity, Maresky said.

"He gives us ideas, canvasses, gets the word out," she said, adding that he constantly tells his friends about it, and they pass it along to their families. "It's amazing how many people have found out about Aaron's Apple just because of him."

Rabbi Dr. Wayne Allen will make the case for a renewed appreciation for six Jewish philosophers who have lapsed into obscurity but whose teachings warrant reconsideration. In six successive sessions Rabbi Allen will present the teachings of Joseph Albo on what must Jews believe, Nachman Krokmal on the genius of the Jewish people, Moritz Lazarus on what makes for moral law, Samuel Alexander on the existence of God, Hans Jonas on living in the shadow of the Sho'ah, and Sidney Hook on transformative power of a single person.

Lebovic JCC celebrates grand opening

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Phase 2 of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan had its grand opening celebration on Sunday with a brunch, reception and tours of the campus.

Spread across 50 acres on Bathurst Street north of Rutherford Road, the Lebovic Campus is home to the northern branch of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, UJA Federation's Schwartz/Reisman Centre, and the Reena Community Residence.

The Mount Sinai Family Health and Wellness Centre, offering non-emergency medical services to users of the Lebovic Campus and residents of York Region, is due to open next month.

Also planned is a northern campus of Bialik Hebrew Day School, which held a groundbreaking at the campus last June for the Ben and Edith Himel Education Centre.

The Jewish community purchased the land for the new campus in 1999, and in 2000 launched a $400-million, decade-long Tomorrow fundraising campaign to build or revitalize three JCC campuses in greater Toronto, including the new campus. To date, $300 million has been raised.

Leslie Gales, chair of the campaign's leadership cabinet, said at the brunch that she's in awe of what's been accomplished. "When I started, this was nothing. In less than 10 years [since the campaign was launched], we have accomplished so much. We should all be so proud."

Gales said that at all three campuses – the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue, the Sherman Campus at Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue, and the Lebovic campus – gym memberships have surpassed expectations, daycares are full and programs are in demand.

"This greatly needed infrastructure [will] strengthen and maintain Jewish infrastructure for years to come," she said.

Isadore Sharp, founder and chairman of Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts, the keynote speaker for the event, called the opening a momentous occasion. "The Jewish community has come a long way since it opened the YM & YWHA on Brunswick Street in 1937. [Then] it was dedicated to sports, but it soon expanded to include cultural and community services."

He said it should be remembered that although the Jewish community had to build its own hospital – Mount Sinai on Yorkville Avenue – to give Jewish doctors a place to practise, Jewish community centres have welcomed people of all faiths and cultures.

"The Jewish community has always included others," he said.

"The House of David and the First Temple Viewed from the Writings of Israel's Ancient Neighbors" by Prof. Maynard Maidman

The dynasty of David and the Temple of Jerusalem are two fundamental pillars of Judaism and of ancient Israelite national identity. Both concepts appear in the writings of Israel's ancient neighbors, the Arameans of Damascus and the Assyrians and Babylonians. Prof. Maidman will discuss what these writings say, what they imply and how they relate to Biblical notions of the same events.

York Region teacher fosters respect in the classroom

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

York Region teacher Pam Feldberg has won two awards in the past couple of months. She was in the Top 5 elementary teachers category of the Retired Teachers of Ontario, and she received an honourable mention in the 2012 Toronto Star Teacher Award.

Feldberg, 55, who teaches grades 3 and 4 in a split class at German Mills Public School, said she loves teaching. "I'm so excited to come back to work every day to try something different with the children."

She believes in "sunshine calls" to keep in touch with parents and "say something nice." As well, it's helpful to her because she finds out more about her students. "Sometimes what they say in the classroom isn't what they say at home," she noted.

In class, she likes to use drama, art and cooking to teach the curriculum. As well, she uses a program called "Tribes" that focuses on mutual respect and working together co-operatively.

Feldberg, who has 32 years of classroom experience, began her career teaching English as a second language after graduating from York University. For six years, she served as course director of English as a second language Part 1 (an additional qualification for teachers) at York.

As a Jewish teacher at a multicultural school, Feldberg said, "We learn about each other daily... The Chinese community just celebrated the Moon Festival, [and] when Rosh Hashanah came, the children knew I wasn't going to be there. We talked about what it was for us."

"On Passover, I bring matzah in for the children. Other children talk about Easter. We're a very global classroom. I think part of inclusion is understanding why we do what we do and getting excited about each other's celebrations and religions, because we're lucky to live in a community where everybody celebrates lots of different things."

Award-winning teacher Pam Feldberg is flanked by two of her students in a recent class at German Mills Public School as she facilitates a community circle that is part of the "Tribes" program.

Zareinu using iPads to aid students

"It is a very expensive school," Markin said, explaining it combines Jewish day school with therapy, which means many families need subsidies to be able to afford to send their children. "But the family is saving a ton of money by going to Zareinu rather than seeking private therapy separately."

The school is working on ramping up its technology through providing state-of-the-art equipment, Markin said. This year, for example, Zareinu's administration brought iPads into the school for therapeutic use. Infants are using them to develop their fine motor skills at an early age.

Markin said ideally, she hopes this year's fundraiser will bring in $500,000. But she continues to set her eyes on increasingly larger goals.

"Perhaps one day, maybe in our 10th year, we'll see it as a million-dollar event," she said.

Beker called it a very well-produced fashion show that is a huge spectacle. But in the end, it's the children who keep her and audiences coming back year after year.

"It's ultimately about these gorgeous kids who are trying to make their way in the world and it's hugely inspiring," she said. "When you visit Zareinu, witnessing the magic and the compassion and caring... That's what keeps you coming back, when you know there's a place with such heart."

Fulford casts light on 'antisemitism without Jews'

Another Swedish ship to challenge naval blockade of Gaza

In his Oct. 6 National Post column, Robert Fulford cast an important light on a neglected phenomenon, "antisemitism without Jews," an obsession with Jews in countries that don't have any.

He describes the case of the Asian state of Malaysia – which is 60 per cent Muslim, but has no Jews – as a fitting example where its government "encourages the citizens to hate Israel and also to hate Jews, whether they are Israelis or not."

Fulford drew attention to a government ministry that, last March, "sent out an official sermon to be read in all mosques, stating that 'Muslims must understand Jews are the main enemy to Muslims as proven by their egotistical behaviour and murders performed by them.'"

He also reminded readers that back in 2003, "the prime minister's political party gave delegates to the United Malays National Organization copies of Henry Ford's anti-Semitic book from the 1920s, The International Jew, a favourite of Hitler, translated into Bahasa Malay."

Indeed, the prime minister at the time, Mahathir Mohamad, had the following to say about Jews at a summit of the 56-member Organization of the Islamic Conference: "[T]oday the Jews rule the world by proxy. They get others to fight and die for them. They invented socialism, Communism, human rights and democracy so that persecuting them would appear to be wrong [and] so they may enjoy equal rights with others. With these [tactics] they have now gained control of the world's most powerful countries and they, this tiny community, have become a world power."

There was not a word of dissent or disapproval from anyone.

Late this summer, Mohamad stood by his antisemitic screed of nearly a decade ago, claiming that, with U.S. elections pending, presidential candidates "all have to seek approval from Israel."

What's particularly disconcerting is how mainstream Mohamad's anti-Jewish and anti-Israel conspiracy theories are in large parts of the Islamic world.

Speaking of such obsessions, at a time when thousands upon thousands of Syrian civilians, including children, are being killed, maimed and tortured by President Bashar Assad's Syrian forces, backed by Iran and Hezbollah, yet another "boat to Gaza," this one a Swedish ship with Canadian activists, including former Canadian MP Jim Manly, is on its way to challenge Israel's naval blockade of Gaza.

ade of Gaza.

This latest mission, part of the Freedom Flotilla movement, comes in the midst of an especially ugly controversy.

Greta Berlin, co-founder of the "Free Gaza Movement," one of the principal sponsors of the Flotilla movement, earlier this month used her platform to spread vicious antisemitic hate when she alleged in a Twitter post that "Zionists operated the [Nazi] concentration camps and helped murder millions of innocent Jews."

In his Oct. 4 American Interest blog, Walter Russell Mead noted that the Free Gaza Movement tried desperately to bury the evidence of Berlin's screed. And for good reason. As Mead wrote: "This is not anti-Zionism. It is not criticism of Israel or defence of Palestinian rights. It is not in the grey zone: it is ugly filth of the lowest kind, gutter antisemitism mixed with genocidal rage."

On the same day, the National Post's Marni Soupcoff also wrote about the hateful Berlin blaming Jews for their own destruction. She observed that in response to the accusation of Jew-hatred, Berlin was still on the attack with this Twitter response to someone who challenged her: "[I] would suggest you concentrate on Israel's genocidal policies," she wrote. "I've apologized. Have you?"

It seems Berlin was only "apologizing" for failing to confine her views about Jews to her personal Facebook page. Her charge that Israel is committing "genocide" against the Palestinians is but another illustration of her antisemitic obsession. She gives a whole new meaning to the term "genocide," since the people against whom Israel allegedly is perpetrating this horrific crime mysteriously continue to grow rapidly in number.

But then hate has a way of twisting the mind in all sorts of impossible directions, as Berlin ably demonstrates – matching, if not surpassing, Mohamad's.

Ottawa defends cuts to part-time chaplains

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The federal government says it doesn't know how many times Jewish inmates requested visits from a Jewish chaplain in the last year.

Vic Toews

Out of 15,023 federal prisoners, 133 identified themselves as Jewish, according to the Ministry of Public Safety.

The admission came last week after Jewish leaders had earlier joined members of other faith groups in denouncing Ottawa's plan to effectively cancel funding for non-Christian prison chaplains at federal jails, when it decided not to renew the contracts of all part-time chaplains.

They were concerned that non-Christian inmates wouldn't have access to chaplains from their own faiths, because the vast majority of full-time chaplains are Christian.

But a spokesperson for Public Safety Minister Vic Toews stressed that volunteer non-Christian chaplains will still be available to prisoners that ask for them.

"The government strongly supports the freedom of religion of all Canadians. Last month, minister Toews asked for an immediate review of the chaplaincy program to ensure taxpayer dollars are being used wisely and appropriately," Julie Carmichael told The C/N last week. "Upon reviewing the program, it was determined that changes were necessary so that this program supports the freedom of religion of inmates while respecting taxpayer dollars. Convicted criminals will continue to have access to religious services of their choice on a voluntary basis."

Most of the non-Christian chaplains working in federal jails are part-time. Out of 80 full-time chaplains in the system, two are non-Christian, but there have never been Jewish full-time chaplains, Carmichael said.

The contract cancellations are scheduled to take effect by the end of March and will affect 49 part-time chaplains nationwide, including 18 non-Christians.

Three of the part-time chaplains are Jewish. The ministry would not release their names.

Part-time contracts represent approximately $1.3 million of the $6.4 million total cost of the chaplaincy program, according to ministry numbers.

Part of the job description for chaplains in the prison system is to facilitate visits by volunteer spiritual leaders of various faiths when requested by inmates.

"There are currently 2,500 volunteers who provide religious services within the correctional system. Minister Toews has instructed the Correctional Service of Canada to facilitate interaction between prisoners and the religious volunteer sector, where safe and appropriate," Carmichael said.

Toews' decision to review the part-time chaplaincy program followed another last month in which he cancelled a tender for a Wiccan priest to minister in federal jails in British Columbia. Toews told the CBC News at the time that he wasn't convinced part-time chaplains from other religions are an appropriate use of taxpayer money and that he would review the policy.

As a result of the review, part-time chaplains will be let go and the remaining full-time chaplains will provide interfaith services and counselling to all inmates and arrange for volunteer non-Christian chaplains when requested.

Jewish inmates comprise less than one per cent of the 15,023 inmates in federal jails, while some 57 per cent identify as Christian. Muslims account for 4.5 per cent of the total, while Buddhists make up two per cent, CBC News reported.

Speaking in the House of Commons after the cuts became public earlier this month, Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, his party's justice and human rights critic, called the government's decision "clearly discriminatory."

He added: "The minister of public safety says that he is 'not in the business of picking and choosing which religions will be given preferential status' - but by providing funding for Christian chaplains only, he is doing precisely that."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), which had strongly criticized the cuts to part-time chaplains when they became public earlier this month, said his organization has suggested to the government that Ottawa compensate Jewish and other non-Christian chaplains on a per-visit basis.

The government told CIJA that it will consider the proposal, he added.

However, Fogel said CIJA still believes that Toews' decision to maintain mostly Christian full-time chaplains amounts to preferential treatment of inmates based on religion.

"Jewish inmates would have access to chaplains only on a volunteer basis, not supported by the system, whereas different Christian communities would have it supported," Fogel said.

אז זו בהחלט סיבה למסיבה. בחנוכה, יום א' 16 בדצמבר ועלו שתי הצגות חגיגיות ב-TORONTO CENTRE FOR THE ARTS, ב-2 ו-4:30 אחה"צ. ההצגה מתאימה לגילאי 3 עד 12 והיא חגיגה של ממש לכל המשפחה.

Through the lens, through the years

There is no shortage of photographs of Israel online. Just go to Flickr.com, enter a keyword or two and you will be overwhelmed with a couple million results. (<http://bit.ly/ispix10>)

But life is short. So I'd like to introduce you to a handful of websites that curate each photo of Israel before it is included. On these sites, you are given a remarkable tour of Palestine – then Israel – from the late 19th century to the present.

Start at the U.S. Library of Congress, custodian of the priceless American Colony in Jerusalem Collection. The American Colony was a non-denominational utopian Christian community of American expatriates living in Ottoman Palestine starting in the late 19th century. Through manuscripts, letters, postcards, telegrams, journals and photographs, the website presents a unique picture of the land and its inhabitants, including:

- A striking photo of worshippers at the Kotel in the mid-1930s.

- An aerial view of Tel Aviv casino and beach, 1932

- The Graf Zeppelin flying over Jerusalem's David's Tower, 1931 (<http://bit.ly/ispix11>)

Many of these pictures are high quality, as well as copyright free. For example, the Kotel photo is 20.7 megabytes. That's enough for you to download, print professionally and frame. Here's the best page to use to search through the thousands of pictures. (<http://bit.ly/ispix12>)

Head over to the State of Israel's National Photo Collection that has digitized thousands of photos dating back to the 1940s. There are some hidden jewels here like:

- Hanna Senesh at Kibbutz Sdot Yam

- British soldiers guarding a barbed wire barrier on the Jaffa border during the curfew imposed on Tel Aviv

- Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion on his daily walk at Kibbutz Sde Boker accompanied by Shimon Peres

and you're bound to come across a gem. (<http://bit.ly/ispix13>)

You may be familiar with the work of the acclaimed photojournalist David Rubinger. Picture three Israel Defence Forces paratroopers – the middle one with his helmet cradled in his hands – gazing upward, dwarfed by the Western Wall. TimePHOTOS presents a photogallery of other shots by Rubinger:

- Face of War: During the War of Independence, a woman receives basic training in grenade throwing.

- Drinking with the Enemy. A

Jordanian soldier hands a cup of tea to an Israeli paratrooper, at the dividing Green Line in Jerusalem, 1956.

- History Men: Prime minister Menachem Begin and Egyptian president Anwar Sadat meet in Aswan, 1980. (<http://bit.ly/ispix14>)

IsraelPhotos.com and Chamelon-sEye (<http://bit.ly/ispix15>) are two commercial sites that post recent press photos for purchase by newspapers and other media. The material ranges from the Gilad Shalit deal (he was held captive by Hamas for five years) and the Carmel forest fire to actor Jason Alexander touring Israel. You'll notice that all the shots include "watermarks" to prevent unauthorized use by the media, but they're still fun to browse through.

Navigating differences within a richly multifaceted group can be an intricate and formidable undertaking. How can an individual hold on to his unique background while remaining in close contact with a broader and more prominent culture?

It's a complicated venture to negotiate individual difference while retaining membership in a distinct, overarching body. Sephardi Jews make up a heterogeneous subset of the Jewish world. The religious commonalities among different types of Jews are significant enough to provide an umbrella identity, a link through common history, religion, and values, although this broad-ranging identity is largely defined by the more dominant Ashkenazi culture. To make assumptions about what it means to be Jewish is to accept stereotypes represented by Ashkenazi traits and to be gently folded into many broad expectations about what it means to be Jewish.

Yet Sephardim are different enough culturally to warrant a discrete, though overlapping, classification. For many Sephardim, self-identifying as a Jew without cultural qualification can be a gratifying and connecting experience, one in which our commonality breeds deep affiliation. But this same prospect may also carry the risk of divergence and alienation, a gulf in experience that could lead to an emphasis on isolation or estrangement in the symbolic renunciation of difference. This conflict speaks to a question of identity: how can we celebrate our similarities and embrace differences without slipping into an extreme position?

In a very personal way, this

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

theme and variations on it have informed my relationship with religion throughout my life. Sephardi culture and tradition permeated my early experience to such extensive proportions that for some time, their influence remained vague in the way that the most basic things about us remain indeterminate, a shadowy presence as an identity taken for granted in the naive assumption that this is just the way things are. At that time, in an uncomplicated way, the insularity and homogeneity of my family and community life contributed to a strong sense of what it means to be Jewish, and more specifically what it means to be a member of a Sephardi family and community. These circumscribed sensibilities pervaded my day-to-day existence, organizing my experiences, and as such were ingested with the ease and passive receptivity of a child being fed on mother's milk.

Some of my earliest memories revolve around my paternal grandparents, my Papo and Meme as we called them. Their house was the heart of our family, the hub around which the family gathered. This robust umbilical tie to the old country developed in a sensorial and visceral, rather than explicit, way. It grounded our family, providing a sense of belongingness and safety that pervaded my early cultural identity. For us, family was everything, and being in our family was inextricably connected to what it meant to be a part of a vibrant Sephardi tradition.

As I grew older, I started to be exposed to Ashkenazi culture through my rabbinic studies in an Ashkenazi yeshiva, but this didn't jeopardize my Sephardi heritage in any way. On the contrary, it made it even stronger. Growing up in the vibrant Sephardi community of Montreal, I created a balance between both traditions, making me into a proud Sephardi Jew.

The value of 'free' incentives

When I first ran extracurricular Jewish programs for high school students, I was able to fill a room by offering a basket of stale pretzels. Soon pretzels were no longer a draw, and doughnuts drew the crowd. Next, we gave away pizza.

Over the years, incentives to attract participants have grown, from free meals to raffles for trips and cars. In my final year teaching high school, I was asked if we would consider offering a cash stipend to participants in a lunch-time learning program. We refused.

We have created a culture of "free" (or at least highly subsidized). To be transparent, throughout college and beyond I reaped the benefit. I ate more than my share of bagel lunches and Chinese dinners. I went to conferences for pennies, and I travelled to Israel – several times – for a few hundred dollars. Some of these experiences enhanced my Jewish identity; others drew me toward a career in Jewish communal service, and still others were just good fun.

To me, these adventures appeared to be free, but to our community, they are costly. Individual donors and foundations, federations and non-profits, and even the State of Israel, annually invest hundreds of millions of dollars to create "free" – dollars that they choose not to spend in other arenas.

Free can be the entry point to sustained commitment. The New York Times knows this. Each month, online readers are granted 10 free articles. This taste of the newspaper entices users to purchase premium access, opening the gates to virtually endless content. Just as the Times cannot afford to have all of its readers read endlessly for free, we as a community cannot afford – financially or sociologically – to have all of our members experience Judaism endlessly for free.

Class Act

In considering our community's investment in "free" as a tool for engagement, I propose that program organizers consider four questions in weighing incentives – big or small – for participation:

- What do the incentives say about our values? A free trip to Israel sends a different message than a raffle for a car. A free dinner in the sukkah speaks different values than a drink at a club. Our choice of incentives demonstrates to participants the underlying culture and intent of the effort.

- How does "free" catalyze movement over the threshold to premium? After a summer at camp, is there a built-in next step to year-round engagement? After a Birthright trip, what support is there to connect participants to local programs and opportunities to return to Israel?

- How do we measure the success of "free"? Beyond counting the heads that show up for free incentives, do we calculate the return on investment over time to determine the lasting impact? How do we demonstrate that "free" drives ongoing engagement?

- What is the impact of "free" on future engagement? To what extent does the incentive inculcate a culture of entitlement? In the long run, does "free" encourage or inhibit participation in full-fare programming?

Incentives bring hundreds of thousands of teens and young adults through our communal doors. In deliberating these investments, however, we must carefully consider the implications of moving from pretzels to pizza to car raffles.

Goldbloom knighted by Pope

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In what was described as an historic event, Christian-Jewish dialogue pioneer Victor Goldbloom was invested into a papal knighthood in a ceremony held at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Shalom on Oct. 4.

Goldbloom, 89, is one of the few non-Christians in the world to be made a Knight of the Order of St. Sylvester, an honour conferred by Pope Benedict XVI.

The occasion is believed to be the first time that papal honours were bestowed on a Roman Catholic and a Jew at the same ceremony, said MC Anne-Marie Trahan, a board member of the Canadian Centre for Ecumenism (CCE). It was also noteworthy for taking place in a synagogue, she added.

The evening, which was attended by a multi-faith and multicultural audience of almost 350, also recognized another inter-religious relations pioneer, Father Irénée Beaubien, 96, who received the Cross Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice. In 1963, the Jesuit priest founded the CCE, which soon after launched formal Christian-Jewish dialogue.

The room was darkened, except for the stage, and a trumpet was sounded as each of the medals was presented.

Goldbloom accepted his from Jean-Claude Cardinal Turcotte, who retired as Archbishop of Montreal this March after 12 years and has been a friend of Goldbloom's for more than 30 years.

"I know few people who stand so firm in their religious conviction, while being so open to listening to those of others," Cardinal Turcotte said of Goldbloom, whose interfaith work goes back more than 50 years and still continues today. That was a time when institutional and even social relations between Jews and Catholics, especially those who were francophone, were rare.

Cardinal Turcotte recommended to the Vatican that Goldbloom receive the knighthood. The current archbishop, Most Rev. Christian Lépine, was also present, as well as Bishop Thomas Dowd.

Iranian writes work in Farsi on the Holocaust

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

An Iranian American physician has written a four-volume book in Farsi on the Holocaust.

Holocaust, by Ari Babaknia, is reportedly the first comprehensive work on the subject in Iran's national language.

"My goal is to educate over 120 million Farsi-speaking people in the world regarding the facts of this human tragedy," said Babaknia in an interview from his home in California, where there is a large Iranian community.

Babaknia's book was published by the David S. Wyman Institute for Holocaust Studies in Washington, D.C. and can be purchased through Amazon.com.

The online edition will be available within a few months through two websites: HolocaustinFarsi.com and Memorah.com.

Volume one of his book is a general description of the Holocaust. The second volume describes the response of the United States. The third volume deals with the reaction of countries such as Britain, France, Poland and the Soviet Union. The fourth volume, a survey of the key personalities involved in the Holocaust and an examination of the liberation of Nazi concentration camps, looks at 20th century atrocities in Armenia, Cambodia, Bosnia, Rwanda and Darfur.

Babaknia, a 65-year-old Jew who left Iran in 1974 to pursue his studies in women's health in the United States, hopes that his work will enable Iranians in Iran and abroad to learn the unvarnished truth about the Holocaust.

In recent years, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has suggested that the Holocaust is a myth and that further research is necessary to validate it as an undisputed fact.

"The Iranian population has very limited knowledge of the Holocaust," said Babaknia. "And regrettably, what they know through [Ahmadinejad] has not been the accurate story of the Holocaust."

To the best of his knowledge, a "comprehensive, credible, well-documented" book about the Holocaust has never been published in Iran.

And until a few years ago, he added, the topic did not appear in Iranian literature.

Babaknia, who spent 15 years researching his book, hopes it will have a beneficial effect on Iranians.

"Anybody is entitled to an opinion," he said. "However, facts are facts and speak for themselves. If we do not provide the facts of this tragedy and do not educate the public, a good portion of Iranian society will believe what they have been fed."

Babaknia scoured the archives of museums and institutions around the world to gather his material. He also read more than 1,000 books about the Holocaust.

He drew several conclusions from his research.

"I learned that European Jewry was ground to dust between the twin millstones of a murderous Nazi regime and a callous free-world leaders' indifference. I also learned that when we witness injustice, indifference and silence are not an option. Silence always favours the oppressor."

To Babaknia, the Holocaust was really a universal event.

"Although the Jews were the victims of the Holocaust, it does not belong to them. The Holocaust is a human catastrophe, the death of human morality. Indifference to the Holocaust is the death of democracy."

In an implicit critique of the Iranian government, he said, "Only through knowledge and understanding can another Holocaust be prevented."

Holocaust denial must be confronted, he declared.

"The story of the Holocaust must be told. The world that was silent yesterday, [and] will remain silent tomorrow unless we open our eyes to someone else's suffering. We must care for each other. We can and we should."

A delegation of 31 Israelis, including 25 mayors from small municipalities, visited Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal this week to learn from Canadian counterparts how to become more effective leaders. The Study Tour to Canada was sponsored by the American Joint Distribution Committee's Israel Institute for Governance and Knowledge. The mayors represent towns and villages of between 2,500 and 15,000 people and a cross-section of Jewish, Arab, Druze and Bedouin citizens. Pictured are the tour's participants on a visit to Markham, Ont., City Hall on Oct. 12.

He originally came up with the idea for a Spin-o-thon, which raised $16,000 in its first year. The two-hour event, which will take place in Thornhill, Ont., features a spin class, prizes, refreshments and more.

This year, in addition to preparing for the fundraiser by collecting donations and wrapping gifts and prizes, he'll be at the event and will give a speech to the participants.

The charity often helps families directly, but they recently formed a partnership with the Hospital For Sick Children. Through the partnership, the hospital can take the money right out of the fund and give it directly to people who need it.

It's another way to make a difference in the community and in other children's lives, Maresky said.

"He's a very happy go lucky kid who just wants to give back and help," she added. "He always says, 'I have to be grateful because not everybody is as lucky as I am.'"

Based in Tel Aviv for the first session, Beyond participants will explore Israel's modern city of innovation.

BBYO launches gap-year Israel experience

Compiled by CJN Staff

WASHINGTON — BBYO has launched a pre-college gap-year program in Israel to provide Jewish teens with meaningful Jewish experiences.

The program, Beyond, brings together four partners: Authentic Israel; Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life; Masa Israel Journey and Tel Aviv University, to offer young people a powerful academic experience, along with service opportunities, leadership programming and travel. Beyond is BBYO's first gap-year offering among its fast-growing menu of Israel experiences.

"Knowing the impact of a gap-year experience in Israel, we feel compelled to leverage our expertise and experience in providing powerful Israel experiences to increase the number of young Jews engaging in long-term study in Israel," said BBYO executive director Matthew Grossman.

"Our teens have requested a gap-year experience, Israeli and North American Jewish leaders have called for more of these programs, and we feel uniquely capable of delivering something scalable and life-changing."

Beyond applicants can choose between a five-month and nine-month experience, both of which are eligible for an automatic Masa Israel scholarship of $1,000, with up to $3,000 more being available based on financial need.

With Tel Aviv University serving as the program's home base, participants have the opportunity to also explore Europe, engage in community service in Africa, and develop new skills such as scuba diving and cooking.

"Programs like Beyond prepare students to thrive in a competitive university setting and shape their worldview in a way that gives meaningful context to their academic studies," said Larry Moneta, vice-president of student affairs at Duke University.

Pinna Gadai Agency, director of Hillel at Tel Aviv University, said, "We know that teens who participate in BBYO programs are much more likely than their peers to seek out positions of leadership and contribute to the world around them. We are pleased to partner in the program and welcome them to our dynamic campus."

"Being in Israel and Tel Aviv specifically offers the unique learning experiences of an environment that is both ancient and modern — where biblical archeology and microchip development are part of the fabric of daily life."

For more information about the gap-year program, visit www.beyondyear.org.

Emory U issues apology

JTA

ATLANTA — Emory University issued a formal apology to Jewish dental students who attended the school between 1948 and 1961 and faced antisemitism.

University president James Wagner delivered the apology at a special event last week that included 32 former students now in their 70s and 80s. The students had received failing grades, were thrown out of school or were forced to repeat classes only because they were Jewish.

"I hereby express in the deepest, strongest terms, Emory's regret for the antisemitic practices of the dental school during those years," Wagner said. "We at Emory also regret that it has taken this long for those events to be properly acknowledged. I am sorry. We are sorry."

Centres for Jewish studies thrive at Toronto universities

Rena Godfrey
Special to The CJN

At the newly renovated Centre for Jewish Studies (CJS) in the Jackman Humanities Building at University of Toronto, complete with a kosher kitchen and funky orange acrylic chairs, Prof. Jeffrey Kopstein, the centre's new director, is elated about the recently announced $5-million gift to the Centre, by Ken and Larry Tanenbaum, co-chairs of an $18-million community campaign at U of T, in partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Roz and Ralph Halbert joined the Tanenbaum family with their gift of $1 million to the centre through UJA Federation's community campaign.

In July, Kopstein, a political science professor, signed on for a five-year term as director of the centre, home to 72 faculty members affiliated with the program and 4,000 students who enrolled in 91 Jewish studies courses last year.

Kopstein, who also teaches an introductory course in Jewish studies, said that approximately 80 per cent of these students are from non-Jewish backgrounds. He hopes that, for some of his non-Jewish students, the course will be a "gateway to a lifelong learning of Jewish civilization."

The goals of the centre are neither religious nor political, but rather scholarly, Kopstein said. "The Jewish studies courses are too important to limit them to one area in the university. The idea [of the centre] is not to ghettoize Jewish studies, but rather to integrate ourselves across the faculty."

The centre combines four areas of interest — classical Judaism, Jewish philosophy and thought, Jewish history and social sciences, and Jewish cultures, languages and literatures. The year-round, free CJS public lectures series is designed to integrate some or all of these areas.

The series gathers experts from around the world who offer a presentation on issues that should appeal to both students and the greater Jewish community. Kopstein believes that the CJS public lecture series is an important part of the centre's ongoing mandate "to build bridges to the community."

Although the series has already begun, lectures by author Nathan Englander, American diplomat Dennis Ross, Prof. Judith Deutsch Kornblatt of the University of Wisconsin-Madison, and Ruth Gavison, one of Israel's leading legal minds, are slated for this fall.

The Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies (CJS) at York University also boasts a free spring lecture series, the Leonard Wolinsky Lectures on Jewish Life and Education. The centre is experiencing tremendous growth, says Prof. Sara Horowitz, director of the Koschitzky Centre since 2005. A large endowment from the Koschitzky family in 2008 has allowed the centre to expand programming for both students and the community at large.

A symposium highlighting the poems and novels of Hans Adler, a German Jewish survivor of Theresienstadt and Auschwitz, will be held Nov. 11 and 12. Although this symposium is intended for research and scholars, there will be two free plenary sessions open to the public.

Another compelling initiative at York's CJS is the Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Antiracism Education — "Learning from the Past, Teaching for the Future," which brings together 15 York University students, mostly future teachers, with students from Germany and Poland to learn first-hand about the Holocaust.

"We want to engage in the Holocaust, to learn from the past and plant seeds for a better future," Horowitz said of this scholarship program. "What makes [this program] so wonderful is not only learning how to morph against antisemitism and racism, but equally important is how students learn to talk across cultures and respect each other's point of view."

For more information, go to www.cjutoronto.ca, the U of T Centre for Jewish Studies website, or www.yorku.ca, the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University.

Question: My son has been single for a few years now. The Court gave him access to his child every two weeks and on Tuesdays.

Due to his work at the time this access was granted, he could not always make Tuesdays. But my ex daughter-in-law would call me to pick up my three grandchildren (sometimes they spent weekends with me).

In the past three months she has not answered my phone calls to my grandchildren. My grandson recently celebrated his tenth birthday and I was denied the opportunity to communicate with him. It is pretty sad when you are unable to see your own grandchildren. What are a grandparent's rights of access to their grandchildren?

Answer: None. At least not in Ontario, according to our Court of Appeal. Ontario courts do not give grandparents special rights of access to children over and above the time you see them when your son is allowed to see them.

In theory, any person can attempt to obtain special rights of access under Ontario's Children's Law Reform Act, so long as the Court determines that it is in the child's "best interests." But the Court of Appeal has minimized the right of grandparents to have access to their grandchildren outside the non-custodial parent's usual visitation schedule. The Court has defined the child's "best interests" as the circle of persons his or her parents wish to build around their child, even if they are "wrong." (What if grandpa happened to be a terrorist?)

However, if a child has built up a particularly strong bond with a grandparent — akin to a "primary" or parental-type relationship — then the Court may well take a different view. In such cases, the child's welfare may become detrimentally affected if the nurturing ties he developed over a period of time with the grandparent are broken. On that basis, a court may well wish to protect a child, but not because it is specifically the "grandparent" with whom he has developed the aforementioned bond. The individual could be the kid's uncle who raised him and was suddenly squeezed out of the picture.

Question: Some time ago, I spent four months in a shelter with my small children because of the violent behavior of my ex-husband. He then left Canada. I now have full custody of the children, and a restraining order against him. He has no access to the children, but an obligation to pay spousal and child support.

He's now back and has sponsored his father to come to Canada. His father has now asked the Family Court for access to his grandchildren on a regular basis. My children have never seen him before. Will the grandfather get access despite the fact that his son, my ex-husband, owes us a large sum, hasn't lived in Canada for some time, and is denied from seeing the children and myself?

Answer: The grandparents of a child can, in theory, gain access to the child if such access is deemed to be in the child's best interests. This usually applies to "psychological" parents, relatives or grandparents who the child has grown up with and who the child needs to see.

If a child has developed an emotionally stable bond with a particular individual that nurtures his or her development, the Courts are not anxious to disrupt it, so long as it does not interfere in the normal rights of the child's parents to raise him.

In Ontario, however, as I have written before, the Ontario Court of Appeal has taken the side of parents against grandparents whenever they have crossed swords over the question of a "right" of access by a grandparent to a child. In the situation you describe, if your case is properly argued, I doubt that the Court would allow the children to see a grandparent whom they had never seen. The Court might suspect that his court application was merely a backdoor ruse to permit the father to see the child.

The failure to pay child support is rarely used by a Judge to stop access to a child, since access to one's parent is a child's right. But having left Canada is somewhat important, and Dad's violent behaviour is key. The Court won't ignore it.

Sukkot, Samaritans and wine

Donald Carr
Special to The CJA

In Israel this year, the four weekdays after the first day of Sukkot were packed with concerts, lectures, parties in the parks and happy celebration by both those referred to as "religious" and those regarded as "non-religious" alike.

Jerusalem was host to a "walk" of thousands, which snaked around the city, guided and protected by armed and unarmed guides. Also, the International Christian Embassy was host to a week of celebrations, culminating in a march through the capital by visitors from a hundred countries, waving and dispensing to the watching crowds small national flags.

Woe befalls anyone who falls sick during this period. There is hardly a doctor to be found and the emergency wards of the hospitals become jammed.

The opportunity to travel across the country was seized upon, and the roads in and out of Tel Aviv and Jerusalem were clogged with traffic.

We took a highway, much unused by both tourists and "ordinary" Israelis who visit the multitude of historical sites in the country. Our destination was Har Grezim.

Road 60 leaves the northern suburbs of Israel's capital and winds its way through the hills and valleys of Shomron (Samaria).

Apart from such communities as Ariel, Beth El and Ofra, which dot a rather barren, but beautiful, landscape, the inhabited areas are all Arab. There is even one Bedouin encampment alongside the road. The Arab towns and villages include many beautiful, relatively new, substantial homes and apartment buildings, alongside older and more rudimentary habitations. The white private car licence plates and the green taxi licence plates, issued to Arabs living in the territories far outnumber the orange ones of Israelis as one travels farther on this road.

An hour and a half driving leads to a side road, which climbs through a small Samaritan/Arab town to the top of the mountain, which is some 886 metres above sea level. It looks down on the busy Arab town of Nablus - ancient Shechem. On the other side of the town rises Har Ebal.

Nablus is the site of the wanton destruction of the Tomb of Joseph, a site that can only be visited now by special arrangement and a military escort.

Both mountains are referred to in the Torah. The Children of Israel are commanded to carry out blessings on Har Grezim and curses on Har Ebal, after having entered into the Land of Israel.

Extensive archeological excavations on Har Grezim have revealed ruins of a series of large towns and sacred precincts dating from the Second Temple period, though the fifth to the first centuries BCE.

Successively, the Hebrews, Persians, Greeks, Samaritans, Muslims and the Byzantines contributed to what was built there. Perhaps most interesting is the history of the Samaritans, who still carry out worship on the mountain.

The Samaritans regard themselves as the true Israelites of the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh and Levi, who survived the exile of the children of Israel to Babylon. Except primarily for their calendar and the lack of the use of tefillin or mezuzot, they maintain all of the mitzvot of Judaism. To this day, they sacrifice the Paschal Lamb at Pesach, on Har Grezim.

At one time, the Samaritans spread over the whole of Samaria, causing concern to the Christians of the area. The Byzantines erected a fortified monastery and church within their sacred precinct. During some 100 years of rebellion by the Samaritans, resulting in exile or conversion to Christianity, their numbers tragically dwindled. By the early 20th century, their number was reported to have dropped to 146. It is estimated that there are now more than 600 Samaritans, split almost evenly between Har Grezim and Holon.

The site was crowded with visitors. At most historical sites in Israel, the visitors present an amazing cross-section of the Jewish, and sometimes Christian, world. One normally hears so many languages.

On the day we were there, virtually every visitor spoke only Hebrew and were clearly Orthodox - but not haredim. It seems that the only people prepared to travel through Arab-inhabited land are either residents of this part of the country or their families. The reason is likely fear of travelling through the territories. It is rather sad that there is no variety of visitors to what is, perhaps, one of the most important historical sites in the land.

itors the most salient parts of the mountain and the excavations, had remarkably good English. On enquiry as to his fluency, he said he had been a shaliach in Australia and the United States. When I remarked that he hadn't referred at all to Canada, he surprised us by telling us about his times at Camp Ramah in Uttersen, Ont., and his visits to Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto. A further example of the amazing coincidences in the Jewish world! Leaving this remarkable site, we turned back on Road 60.

Only a few kilometres south, there is a sign to a moshav, Rechelim, and the Tura Estate Winery.

Rechelim is home to some 50 families. It is named in memory of two Israeli women, both called Rachel, who were murdered near there by Arabs some years ago. For us, it provided a sukkah in which we could eat our lunch. In addition, the moshav's claim to fame is one of the best boutique kosher wineries in the country.

Vered Ben Sa'adon and her husband, Erez, first planted grapes on nearby Har Bracha, which can be seen from Har Grezim. They raised a wonderful crop and sold them to a large winery. Soon, however, the winery discontinued buying the grapes, because they were grown across the Green Line, Israel's pre-1967 border. Desperate, because cultivating the grapes and selling them was their only livelihood, the Ben Sa'adons decided to attempt to make their own wine using whatever capital they could find.

They started by producing 100 bottles the first year. They used Erez as a logical name for their wine. The wine was excellent and started to be known farther afield. Not terribly sophisticated in business, they did nothing to protect the name and were dismayed to learn that another, much larger and wealthier vineyard had started to use that name. Unable to contest this use, Vered and Erez created a new name, Tura Estate Winery, with the motto "Patience and Inspiration."

Tura Estate Winery now produces more than 1,500 bottles of kosher wine annually. Among its products are a full-bodied Merlot, a light and dry Chardonnay and - difficult to find in Israel - a Port, which challenges any of the Portuguese wine we have tasted. They now also produce olive oil and honey.

A cleverly designed, modern tasting area welcomes visitors, and the wine barrels are stored in cellars, which themselves give the impression of being inside a barrel, with the walls and roof being the same type of wood used for barrels.

The story of the Sa'adons is truly one of patience and inspiration. They are representative of the modern pioneering spirit that abounds among the Israelis.

Bombers of Paris-area kosher store at large

JTA

MARSEILLE, France — French authorities have indicted seven suspects in the recent bombing of a kosher store near Paris but have not caught those who hurled the bomb, a Paris prosecutor said.

Francois Molins of the Paris public prosecutor's office said on Saturday that seven suspects have been indicted for belonging to a terrorist association and that two of them will be tried for complicity in attempted murder.

Molins has said the men belong to "an extremely dangerous terrorist, jihadist cell" which perpetrated the Sept. 19 bombing of a kosher supermarket in Sarcelles, a northern suburb of Paris.

Two men wearing masks hurled a self-made explosive device into the crowded store at noon. One man sustained minor injuries in the explosion. Last week, French authorities discovered a cache of weapons and explosives near Paris, which they believe belonged to the terrorist cell.

On Oct. 6 and 7, French anti-terror police arrested 12 suspects in connection with the attack in a series of raids in several French cities. In one raid, in Strasbourg, police shot and killed Jérémie Louis-Sidney, 33, after he fired on officers at his apartment building.

On Sunday, the weekly Journal du Dimanche quoted Molins as saying: "We have identified the planners of this attack, we know Louis-Sidney handled the explosive device, but we are missing the two people who actually threw it in."

He is quoted as adding: "According to the testimonies, the videos from the security cameras and other materials from the investigation, the two young men — one black and the other white — who threw in the device are at large."

There is "a risk," he said, that not all the culprits "would be identified beyond doubt."

Such investigations, he added "always present the same problem — you either keep pulling on the thread until you've undone the whole yarn ball, or you cut the thread. With a terrorist network, and considering how dangerous this one was, we could not afford to wait."

Richard Prasquier, the president of CRIF, the umbrella group representing French Jewish communities, has praised French authorities for the "quick action" in pursuing the perpetrators of the attack.

In related news, a Jewish man was attacked and rendered unconscious in a Paris metro, a local watchdog reported.

The 52-year-old victim entered the subway directly from his synagogue but wore no markings that would identify him as Jewish, according to a report on the late September incident by the National Bureau of Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism, or BNVCA, a non-profit watchdog organization. The incident occurred on the eve of Rosh Hashanah.

He may have been targeted because of a Jewish philosophy book by the chief rabbi of Paris that he was reading in the metro when he was attacked, the report said.

The attackers, who are unknown, knocked the man unconscious with a sharp blow to his temple and did not steal anything from him as he lay unconscious on the subway floor. He sustained minor injuries.

A female passenger found the man lying on the floor and moved him out of the vehicle at Miromesnil station, near Champs-Élysées.

"It is clear from the pattern of incidents we are seeing that this was in all likelihood an antisemitic attack," BNVCA president Sammy Ghoslan told JTA.

Last week, the security unit of France's Jewish community, SPCJ, reported a 45 per cent rise in antisemitic incidents during the first eight months of 2012 in comparison with their 2011 level of 266 incidents. SPCJ also reported three separate attacks that occurred during the High Holidays.

It's time to stop the hatred

Abdulateef Al-Mulhim

Thirty-nine years ago, on Oct. 6, 1973, the third major war between the Arabs and Israel broke out. The war lasted only 20 days. The two sides were engaged in two other major wars, in 1948 and 1967. The 1967 war lasted only six days. But these three wars were not the only Arab-Israeli confrontations.

From the period of 1948 and to this day, many confrontations have taken place. Some of them were small clashes and many of them were full-scale battles, but there were no major wars apart from the ones I mentioned.

The Arab-Israeli conflict is the most complicated conflict the world ever experienced. On the anniversary of the 1973 war between the Arabs and the Israelis, many people in the Arab world are beginning to ask questions about the past, present and the future with regard to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The questions now are: what was the real cost of these wars to the Arab world and its people? And the harder question that no Arab national wants to ask is: what was the real cost for not recognizing Israel in 1948 and why didn't the Arab states spend their assets on education, health care and infrastructure instead of wars? But, the hardest question that no Arab national wants to hear is whether Israel is the real enemy of the Arab world and the Arab people.

I decided to write this article after I saw photos and reports about a starving child in Yemen, a burned ancient Aleppo souk in Syria, the underdeveloped Sinai in Egypt, car bombs in Iraq and the destroyed buildings in Libya. The photos and the reports were shown on the Al-Arabiya network, which is the most watched and respected news outlet in the Middle East.

The common thing among all what I saw is that the destruction and the atrocities are not done by an outside enemy. The starvation, the killings and the destruction in these Arab countries are done by the same hands that are supposed to protect and build unity in these countries, and safeguard the people of these countries. So, the question now is, who is the real enemy of the Arab world?

The Arab world wasted hundreds of billions of dollars and lost tens of thousands of innocent lives fighting Israel, which they considered their sworn enemy, an enemy whose existence they never recognized. The Arab world has many enemies, and Israel should have been at the bottom of the list.

The real enemies of the Arab world are corruption, lack of good education, lack of good health care, lack of freedom and lack of respect for the human lives. As well, the Arab world has had many dictators who used the Arab-Israeli conflict to suppress their own people. These dictators' atrocities against their own people are far worse than all the full-scale Arab-Israeli wars.

In the past, we have talked about why some Israeli soldiers attack and mistreat Palestinians. Also, we saw Israeli planes and tanks attack various Arab countries. But, do these attacks match the current atrocities being committed by some Arab states against their own people?

In Syria, the atrocities are beyond anybody's imaginations. And, aren't the Iraqis the ones who are destroying their own country? Wasn't it Tunisia's dictator who was able to steal $13 billion from the poor Tunisians? And how can a child starve in Yemen if the land is the most fertile land in the world? Why would Iraqi brains leave Iraq, a country that makes $110 billion from oil export? Why do the Lebanese fail to govern one of the tiniest countries in the world? And what made the Arab states start sinking into chaos?

On May 14, 1948, the State of Israel was declared. And just one day after that, on May 15, 1948, the Arabs declared war on Israel to get back Palestine. The war ended on March 10, 1949. It lasted for nine months, three weeks and two days. The Arabs lost the war and called this war nakba (catastrophic war). The Arabs gained nothing and thousands of Palestinians became refugees.

In 1967, the Arabs led by Egypt under the rule of president Gamal Abdel Nasser, Thursday to replace negotiations with Israel with "holy jihad," claiming that if Jews are allowed to pray on the Temple Mount they will destroy the Al-Aqsa Mosque and supplant it with the third temple. Mohammed Badie, Supreme Guide of the Muslim Brotherhood, declared in a public message published by Egyptian daily Al-Ahram that "the Zionists only understand force" and that Arabs cannot hope to achieve justice from the Jews "through the corridors of the United Nations or through negotiations."

Israel attacks Gaza terrorists

Israel's Air Force last Thursday bombed what it called a "terror activity site" in the northern Gaza Strip. The attack was in retaliation for rocket fire on southern went to war with Israel and lost more Palestinian land, and made more Palestinian refugees who are now on the mercy of the countries that host them. The Arabs called this war naksa (upset).

The Arabs never admitted defeat in both wars, and the Palestinian cause got more complicated. And now, with the never-ending Arab Spring, the Arab world has no time for the Palestinian refugees or the Palestinian cause because many Arabs are refugees themselves under constant attacks from their own forces.

Syrians are leaving their own country, not because of the Israeli planes dropping bombs on them. It is the Syrian air force dropping the bombs. Iraqi Arab Muslims are leaving Iraq for the West. In Yemen, the world's saddest human-tragedy play is being written by the Yemenis. In Egypt, the people in the Sinai are forgotten.

Finally, while many of the Arab states are in disarray, what has happened to the Arabs' sworn enemy Israel?

Israel. It damaged the Izz al-Din al-Qasam training camp. No one was injured in the attack. Since the beginning of this year, more than 500 rockets fired from the Gaza Strip have hit Israel, including more than 40 in October, the Israeli Defence Forces said.

Nasrallah admits drone attack

Admitting to a move aimed at provoking Israel, Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah claimed responsibility for his group launching the drone aircraft that was recently shot down in Israeli airspace not far from Israel's nuclear reactor site at Dimona. "It is our natural right to send other reconnaissance flights inside occupied Palestine..." This is not the first time and will not be the last. We can reach any place we want," Nasrallah said in a televised address. Iran's Revolutionary Guards Corp Israel now has the most advanced research facilities, top universities and advanced infrastructure. Many Arabs don't know that the life expectancy of the Palestinians living in Israel is far longer than in many Arab states and that they enjoy far better political and social freedom than many of their Arab brothers. Even the Palestinians living under Israeli occupation in the West Bank and Gaza Strip enjoy more political and social rights than those in some places in the Arab world. Wasn't one of the judges who sent a former Israeli president to jail an Israeli-Palestinian?

The Arab Spring showed the world that the Palestinians are happier and in a better situation than their Arab brothers who fought to liberate them from the Israelis. Now, it is time to stop the hatred and wars and start to create better living conditions for the future Arab generations.

claimed that the drone successfully photographed the Dimona reactor. Another report from the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot said that the Israeli F-16 missed the drone on its first missile attempt.

Israelis go to polls

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced that national elections will be held on Jan. 22. The date was released last Thursday by the Prime Minister's Office, as it appears on the draft of the bill that would dissolve the current Knesset. The elections for the 19th Knesset will be held about one year earlier than they were scheduled and four years since the last election. The Knesset ministerial committee for legislative affairs will take up the bill on Oct. 14. The Knesset's winter session is set to begin the next day, when it will likely consider the dissolution bill.

No new technology in Mideast conflict: expert

Mitch Ginsburg
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Reports claiming that Hamas is using multi-barrel rocket launchers that are triggered by cellphone timers sparked concern in Israel earlier this week, when an upsurge in rocket fire hit the south.

But a leading Israeli missile expert said Hamas does not have sophisticated multiple-launch capabilities and that remote-control launchers are not new.

According to Israeli media, the rockets that hit the south on Monday were fired from multiple launchers that are a potential challenge to the Iron Dome defence system, while the remote-control launch mechanism was described as a potential means for rocket-launch terror teams to avoid Israeli aircraft and surveillance.

An officer with the Southern Command told Channel 10 News that Hamas was "increasingly using" multi-barrel rocket systems in "preparation" for a future conflict with Israel, and that the "accelerated development" of systems capable of launching barrages of fire at Israel was part of an effort to thwart "the successes of Iron Dome."

He added that in an effort to "copy Hezbollah," Hamas was also using truck-mounted launchers.

However, Uzi Rubin, the former head of Israel's missile defence organization within the Ministry of Defence, said that the "remote control is no secret and is not new."

Nor are the videos of Hamas' multi-rocket launchers all authentic, he told The Times of Israel last Wednesday. "The footage of the launchers on pickup trucks is actually from Libya."

In fact, Hamas' ostensible multi-launch systems are improvised, bound together and dug into pits, and are less accurate than a true multi-barrel rocket system, said Rubin, who was also the chief engineer of the Arrow anti-missile system.

Those systems, based on the Russian Katyusha model that the Red Army used against German troops back in July 1941, have remained in use on account of their rapid firepower and mobility.

As Hezbollah showed during the Second Lebanon War in 2006, a truck carrying Katyusha rockets can pull out from cover for several seconds, fire a devastating salvo and return to cover, Iron Dome, though, Rubin said, can handle a barrage. The system's capacity, as listed on the website of Rafael Advanced Defense Systems Ltd., is 20 rockets, but the Israel Defence Forces may have altered Iron Dome to its own operational needs. Rubin said he would not discuss its maximum capacity, but asserted that in June it had handled a multi-rocket barrage on Ashdod without a problem.

In general, continued Rubin, there are no game changers in the ongoing conflict with the terror organizations in the Gaza Strip. Each side continues to develop the technology it needs. Rockets beget anti-rocket technology. Multi-rocket launchers beget additional [but expensive] Iron Dome batteries. And so on. "There is no ultimate winner. It is a game without end," he said.

Hamas and other Gaza-based organizations fired 50 mortars and rockets into the south on Monday morning, in what they said was retaliation for an Oct. 7 Israeli airstrike against two global jihad terrorists, Tala'at al Gharbi and Abdallah Makawi, who were seen travelling by motorcycle. Makawi, who was killed in the strike, was involved in a June 18 attack along the security fence that killed an Israeli civilian, according to the IDF spokesperson's office, and was planning an additional operation at the time of his death.

Longtime U.S. senator dies at 82

Ron Kampeas
JTA

WASHINGTON — Arlen Specter, the longtime moderate Jewish Republican senator from Pennsylvania whose surprise party switch helped pass President Barack Obama's health-care reforms, has died.

Specter, 82, died Sunday at his Philadelphia home following a long struggle with non-Hodgkins lymphoma, his family told the Associated Press.

He was first elected to the U.S. Senate from Pennsylvania in 1980, and his 30 years as a senator was a record in his state.

Specter was a combative, moderate Republican with an interest in foreign affairs. Throughout the years, he maintained contact with the Assad regimes in Syria, even as the country became more isolated, and he offered himself as a broker for Syria-Israel peace talks.

As his party grew more conservative, he bucked it on social issues and health funding. Specter broke with the Republicans in 2009, joining the Democrats because, he said, "the Republican party has moved far to the right." The switch effectively ended a long tradition of the Republican party having at least one moderate Jewish senator.

Jewish life carries on despite attack in Sweden

Cnaan Liphshiz
JTA

MALMO, Sweden — Hours after the late-night explosion outside the Jewish community centre in Malmö, Sweden, the scent of baking challah already was wafting from the centre's ovens into the chilly morning air, as it does every Friday morning. Later, the Jewish preschool at the site would open as usual.

A smashed bulletproof glass window and two police officers standing watch were the only evidence of a Sept. 28 attack in which assailants set off an explosive device and threw bricks at the centre's door, according to Rabbi Rebecca Lillian, who lives in the building.

Swedish police arrested and then released two 18-year-old male suspects whom witnesses had placed at the scene; the city's prosecutor is considering whether to indict them.

'The community here used to keep a low profile, but there's a feeling that we are lost if we do nothing now'

Some Swedish Jews said the attack was yet another unwelcome reminder that they must bolster their public campaign against antisemitism, which only recently began to gain steam in the Scandinavian country after years of attacks and intimidation against Jews, often by local Muslims.

"The attack on the synagogue may have been an attempt to intimidate us back into submission," said Annika Hernroth-Rothstein, a 31-year-old Jewish woman from a city near Stockholm who has helped organize some of the recent Jewish solidarity rallies in Sweden.

"The decision by Swedish Jews to rally against antisemitism is perceived by perpetrators as provocation," she told JTA. "We must go on: it may need to get worse before it gets better."

Fred Kahn, board chairman of Malmö's Jewish community of approximately 1,000, said he insisted on a business-as-usual approach after the attack "to show our enemies they have no chance of intimidating us."

The rallies against antisemitism in Sweden — at least 10 so far — began last December when a few Malmö synagogue-goers decided to wear their kippot after services and, in violation of security protocol, marched with them through town. Several more "kippah walks" followed, all organized by members of the community through Facebook.

One gathering in August in Stockholm drew about 400 Jews and non-Jews, including government ministers. A similar number showed up for a rally in Stockholm on Sunday, including some leading politicians. Another solidarity march is planned for Oct. 20 in Malmö.

"The community here used to keep a low profile, but there's a feeling that we are lost if we do nothing now," Frederik Sieradski, a spokesman for the Malmö Jewish community, told JTA during a recent solidarity trip that Jews from Copenhagen made to his city of 300,000 — the third largest in Sweden.

The newly aggressive public actions by Jews against antisemitism mark a significant shift for Swedish Jews, according to Mikael Tossavainen, a Swedish-born researcher of antisemitism in Scandinavia at Tel Aviv University's Kantor Center for the Study of Contemporary Jewry.

Tossavainen noted that a "very similar attack" against Malmö's only Orthodox synagogue in 2010 "attracted far less international attention and response" than the Sept. 28 attack. The emergence of the kippah walks was a major factor in attracting attention to the problem in Malmö, he said. Another factor, Tossavainen said, was the city's mayor, Ilmar Reepalu, who made international headlines when he advised Jews who want to be safe in Malmö to reject Zionism.

Though he has condemned antisemitism, Reepalu has called Zionism a form of "extremism" comparable with antisemitism and said the Jewish community has been "infiltrated" by anti-Muslim agents.

During her visit to the country in June, Hannah Rosenthal, the Obama administration's special envoy for combating antisemitism, said Malmö under Reepalu is a prime example of "new antisemitism," where anti-Israel sentiment serves as a thin guise for Jew-hatred.

Since her visit, Malmö police have been more willing to follow up on complaints about antisemitism, according to Rabbi Shneur Kesselman, an envoy of the Chabad-Lubavitch movement to Malmö.

Data by the Swedish National Council for Crime Prevention show that in the years 2009 to 2011, Malmö saw an average of 70 antisemitic incidents a year.

Daisy Balkin Rung, a Jewish woman who grew up in Malmö but left years ago, came to a different conclusion after the attack. In a controversial op-ed on the website of Sweden's TV4 that generated chatter on media outlets throughout the country, Rung called on Jews to leave Malmö.

"It's sad to admit: the kippah walks are a good thing, but they are not changing the situation in Malmö," Rung told JTA. "I'm afraid Malmö is one battle which the other side has won."

Chavez wins re-election, defeats Capriles Radonski

JTA

BUENOS AIRES — Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez, an ally of Iran, won re-election, defeating Henrique Capriles Radonski, the grandson of Holocaust survivors.

Chavez took 54 per cent of the vote to Radonski's 45 per cent in the Oct. 7 poll.

His term will end in 2019, extending his rule over the OPEC member state to two decades.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center expressed its concern over Chavez's re-election, citing the fact that Venezuela has Shahab 3 long-range missile launching platforms on the country's Caribbean coast aimed at Florida.

"Hugo Chavez's triumph can only strengthen Iran's political and military penetration of Latin America," Dr. Shimon Samuels, director of international relations for the Simon Wiesenthal Center, told JTA on Tuesday.

"Six more years of the Caracas-Tehran axis could be as perilous as an Afghanistan with oil," he added.

Argentina's president, Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner, used Twitter to congratulate her regional ally.

"Your victory is also ours. Go Hugo," she tweeted.

Sergio Widder, the Wiesenthal Center's director for Latin America, told JTA that "Chavez reportedly facilitated the recent dialogue between Argentina and Iran, clearly aimed at closing both the AMIA Jewish Center bombing investigation and Buenos Aires' demand for extradition of the Iranians complicit in that atrocity."

Since taking power in 1999, Chavez has become a global "anti-imperialism" fighter and a close ally of leaders from Iran, Cuba, Bolivia and Belarus. Chavez, a former soldier, has described Israel's treatment of the Palestinians as "genocide" and called Zionism racism.

Last July, Venezuela was accepted as a full member of the Mercosur regional free trade and political group, and will have increased influence in a bloc that also includes Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay. Mercosur's members all recognize a Palestinian state.

'Bencher capitalists' design app to personalize benching

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Chances are when you rummage through that drawer looking for the benching booklet you picked up at a simchah – the one next to the drawer with all the souvenir kippot – you'll find a suitable pamphlet with which to say your post-meal grace.

Nothing wrong with that – it's the gift that keeps on giving. But a couple of entrepreneurial "bencher capitalists" had an idea to take the benching book to another level. Toronto-native Yitz Woolf and former Bostonian Daniel Laufer, who both made aliyah, have started a business called Let's Bench that provides personalized benching books you can decorate as you see fit.

Printed in Israel and shipped around the world, the benching books combine ancient tradition and cutting-edge technology. They can contain pretty much any decorative, personalized photographs you choose. You can also add stock images of Judaica, scenes of Israel or additional texts. The benching books are perfect for making life cycle events, like bar or bat mitzvahs, weddings, anniversaries or even organizational dinners, that much more memorable, they say.

Customers can visit Let's Bench's website and choose from a variety of nusachim – styles or customs communities employ when saying grace. So far, an "egalitarian version," which includes the matriarchs in the prayers, along with "Ashkenazi regular" have proven the most popular.

Using a simple app, customers upload their own photos and choose where in the benching book template they will place the pictures. Orders are placed online and the books are printed in Israel, where Let's Bench can assure quality control and monitor their production.

Let's Bench priced alternative printing sites, including China and the United States, but Israel came out ahead in price and quality. "Plus, a lot of Jewish people like to support Israel. But the main thing is quality control – we check the binding, the cropping [picture sizing]," Woolf said.

Since it was launched, Let's Bench has filled around 60 orders, each averaging 100 to 150 booklets. The largest was for 300 benching books for a wedding celebration. Orders have come in from Canada, the United States, England and Israel.

A typical Let's Bench order came for a wedding that united a woman from Toronto and a man from Tel Aviv. "They found our site online when they were looking for a Conservative rabbi to officiate. Our ad popped up," Woolf said. They included photos of themselves, their parents, pictures of Toronto and Israel, along with Jewish-themed objects like a challah and kiddush cups.

Another benching booklet, produced for a 50th anniversary party, featured photos of the couple along with pictures of their children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren. It was a great souvenir of the event, Woolf said, adding benching books are used repeatedly, reminding people of the simchah in the years to come.

Woolf, 37, and Laufer launched Let's Bench around Chanukah last year. "It was a soft launch without much publicity," Woolf said. Because the booklets are sold online and rely on code developed in Israel, it was important to work out any bugs before ramping up a publicity campaign, he added.

To date, the venture has proven to be a break-even proposition – if you account only for the out-of-pocket costs. Each contributed $5,000 towards the venture, but Woolf said that doesn't include the value of the time they invested.

A graphic designer, photographer and Internet maven by profession, Woolf designed the project's templates, found its content and generally oversaw the artistic aspect of the project. Laufer handled the business aspects of the venture, including financing, printing, shipping and accounting.

Woolf acknowledged that Let's Bench can't support two people at this time. He continues his other ventures – photographing simchahs, working in graphic design, creating websites.

"We're hoping we can build this into a full-time business," he said. "We hope to add some more products to our [inventory]."

Prior to hooking up with Laufer, Woolf had been looking to start a new business. One day, out of the blue, he received a call from Laufer who suggested they collaborate on the benching venture. Woolf jumped at the opportunity. He had been considering his own business modifying traditional benching books, but only to change their look and style. He quickly recognized that Laufer's idea of personalizing them with photos took his idea to the next level and meshed nicely with his own concepts. "It was a perfect fit," he said.

Laufer, who made aliyah in 1989, had heard of Woolf through mutual friends at the Shira Hadasha synagogue in the German Colony section of Jerusalem. Woolf made aliyah seven years ago after obtaining a degree in marketing and business management. He had been working as a freelance graphic designer in Toronto and realized his skills were portable – he could ply his trade anywhere around the world.

An alumnus of Eitz Chaim Day School in Toronto, Woolf already had a sister living in Israel, and his parents visited there four times a year.

Encouraged also by the Nefesh B'Nefesh program, which promotes aliyah, and discouraged by the Toronto winters, he made the move.

"It's a different lifestyle," he conceded, but he has lots of friends there and it's a move he does not regret.

Book chronicles ascendancy of Barbra Streisand

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

As legions of Barbra Streisand fans pay exorbitant prices (top tickets are more than $500) for tickets to see her during her latest (and perhaps last) world tour – which includes a concert at Toronto's Air Canada Centre on Oct. 23 – it seems a fortuitous time for the release of Hello, Gorgeous (Houghton Mifflin Harcourt). William J. Mann's new 500-page opus about the iconic performer who has won two Academy Awards and nearly every other major award that show business offers.

Surprisingly, considering its heft, the book isn't a full biography: it covers only the first five years of Streisand's career, chronicling her ascendancy from her first stage appearances in 1960 as a brash, nervous, gawky 17-year-old from Brooklyn to her decisive Broadway triumph in the musical Funny Girl. The title comes from Streisand's memorable opening line in that show, when she comes on stage, takes a long look in a mirror, and says to herself, "Hello, gorgeous."

Mann tells us that Streisand had adored her father, who had died when she was very young, and grew up starved for affection and approval from her hard-to-please mother; and so sought affection and approval from audiences. One of her first gigs involved a talent contest in a small Manhattan nightclub. There was a vulnerability about the homely girl in front of the microphone that made the audience root for her.

"The room had exploded into cheers for her, and she won the contest," Mann writes, describing a scene that would become familiar. An early boyfriend who'd helped expand her initially tiny repertoire noted how her eyes and face would come alive with every ovation, illuminated by "an electric look generated by the power of the applause."

In order to be mesmerizing on stage, Streisand had learned early on that she had to be an actor as well as a singer, injecting songs with as much emotion, pathos, or sex appeal as they seemed to require. For a song like Cry Me a River, for example, she made it about her relationship with the previously mentioned boyfriend, which ended badly. "The pros are talking about a rising new star on the local scene," critic Dorothy Kilgallen wrote. "Eighteen-year-old Barbra Streisand never had a singing lesson in her life, doesn't know how to walk, dress or take a bow, but she projects well enough to bring the house down."

Coached by a coterie of show-biz veterans, Streisand learned new songs and painstakingly weaved together a stage persona using definitive elements of Audrey Hepburn, Mae West, Billie Holiday, Judy Garland and, yes, Fannie Brice. Indeed, Streisand shared a basic and inescapable feature with Brice – a funny-looking nose. Her famous decision not to have it fixed was a reflection of her constant determination to be taken for who she was, and on her own terms. Her crooked nose became as strong an emblem of her individuality as the unique spelling of her first name: she had dropped the usual middle "a" from Barbara soon after winning the talent contest.

At 19 she made her Broadway debut in the Harold Rome musical I Can Get It For You Wholesale, based on the 1937 Jerome Weidman novel. She garnered raves for her supporting role as Miss Marmelstein, a spinsterish secretary who comes rolling out in her office chair, kvetching in song about how no one addresses her intimately by her first name or using an affectionate pet name. The New York Times gave the show a positive review and singled out Streisand, describing her as "the evening's find... a girl with an oafish expression, a loud irascible voice and an arpeggiated laugh. Miss Streisand is a natural comedienne."

As the number and range of her television spots, nightclub gigs and recording sessions grew, so did her salary, and Streisand, in this period, took her own apartment for the first time; she had previously been living like a nomad in borrowed rooms and temporary sublets. She also became romantically involved with the show's male lead, Elliott Gould, whom she would marry. (As her career rose meteorically and he tanked, the marriage quickly fell apart.) She also acquired a manager, an agent and other assorted professional handlers.

Film producer Ray Stark, son-in-law of the legendary Fannie Brice, wanted to produce a Broadway musical called Funny Girl about Brice's stormy marriage to gambler Nick Arnstein. Streisand was desperate for the lead, believing it would push her over the cusp to stardom. Other contenders for the part included Anne Bancroft, Carole Burnett, Eydie Gorme and Judy Holliday.

As Mann notes, she had a natural resemblance to Brice that tipped the scales in her favour. "The 'angular young girl with the nose of an eagle, slightly out-of-focus eyes and a mouth engaged in a battle with a wad of gum' [as one reporter had described her] could just as easily have been Fannie Brice as Barbra Streisand." She tried to enhance the similarities whenever she could. In her various television appearances and interviews, she became as Brice-like as possible in order to improve her chances for the role.

Streisand won the part, of course, but, ironically, by the time she was playing it she was playing herself more than anyone, since the script, rewritten endlessly, was ultimately crafted around her own oversized public persona as much as it was around Brice. The lyrics, too, often seemed to describe Streisand's own temperament and aspirations, as in: "I'm the greatest star, I am by far, but no one knows it."

Interestingly, not all of Streisand's instincts proved sound. For example, she initially didn't want to sing two songs in Funny Girl that she thought weren't right for her – People and Don't Rain On My Parade – both of which ended up being among her most identifiable signature tunes.

Mann does not overlook Streisand's less attractive qualities – she was often demanding and was famously narcissistic – but still Hello, Gorgeous reads like hagiography. There's as much here, I suppose, as most people will ever want to know about Streisand's early years. Even those who don't count themselves as fans (myself included) may still be intrigued by this well-researched, novelized account of an ugly duckling turned swan with the magical ability to rouse audiences into sustained and rapturous applause. It's a quintessential show-business tale.

Perlman in a reflective mood on new recording

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

When Itzhak Perlman plays the violin, magic happens.

Perhaps no other violinist in the last century has had the ability to so transport an audience with quite the same emotive and expressive technique.

Accolades galore have been heaped on him for his classical recordings and live concerts. But ask him what stirs his soul musically and the response veers toward the music he was weaned on: "Jewish comfort music," he said.

Speaking to The C/N last week from his home in New York, Perlman talked about his latest album, Eternal Echoes: Songs and Dances for the Soul, a collaborative recording with Israeli cantor Yitzchak Helfgot comprising 10 tracks of songs ranging from Jewish liturgical selections like Kol Nidre to Yiddish folk songs such as Dem Trisker Rebn's Nign and A Dudele.

He said these are a selection of songs he remembers growing up to as a boy in Israel and singing with family at Shabbat services and dinners.

"I would always listen to those old-time phenomenal cantors," Perlman said. "I wanted to experience this music myself and also listen to a great voice sing it. I do this because I love it."

"My day job is a classical violin player. But when I do something outside of that, I need to feel comfortable. And in this case, I was so comfortable."

He said that the process of recording the album was "amazing."

"I had a smile like the cat who ate the canary" throughout the recording process, he said. And everyone who heard it knew something special was happening, including the executives at Sony Music.

"And cantorial 'chazzanish' music is not exactly what they do every day at Sony," Perlman said, laughing. "Even the sound engineers were kvelling."

Asked why he decided to record this album, Perlman said after hearing cantor Helfgot sing in Tel Aviv, he knew he wanted to make an album with him.

"I'm a sucker for great sounds and tones and voices. And he has a great voice," he said. "I think this album is something everyone should hear, in all Jewish communities. It's a feel-good album, and I hope it brings Jews of different religious streams and backgrounds together."

In an email to The C/N, Helfgot said that working with Perlman was a dream come true.

"I was delighted and humbled at the opportunity to work with the world's greatest violinist. It is not often that one gets such an amazing opportunity," he wrote.

"It is my hope and fervent wish that this unique project, with the stirring and mystical sound of the violin as its lead, will bring people of different faiths together in the love, appreciation and enjoyment of the sacred music of our heritage. This truly is a celebration of Jewish music and culture."

Perlman will be in Toronto to give a recital on Nov. 18 at Roy Thomson Hall, where he's scheduled to play Mozart's Sonata K 526, Faure's Sonata A Major (Op. 13), and Stravinsky's Suite Italienne along with "works to be announced from the stage," according to organizers at Roy Thomson Hall.

Perlman said it's always "so much fun" for him to return to Toronto, particularly since his protégé and friend, maestro Peter Oundjian, now leads the Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

The special synergy of two Yitzhaks

Some collaborations - peanut butter and jam, sunrise and sunset, roses and soft petals - are gifts to us from a Higher Place and for a special purpose.

The musical combination of the iconic, much beloved violinist Itzhak Perlman and Cantor Yitzchak Meir Helfgot is such collaboration.

Eternal Echoes: Songs and dances for the soul (produced by David Lai and Hankus Netsky, Sony Classics) brings the two men and their unique, prodigious talents together in a listening experience that must be described as wondrous and moving. The force of the combined musical and emotional synergy of these two Yitzhaks envelopes the listener in a sound and echo chamber of what Perlman himself described as "Jewish comfort music."

To describe Helfgot's tenor voice as robust is akin to saying a storm is a strong wind. The Israeli-born chazzan, now the chief chazzan at Manhattan's Park East Synagogue, demonstrates both great power and great control with his very large voice, the edges of which are sharp, crisp and always clearly defined. Of Helfgot's voice, Perlman says, "It gives you goose bumps, like Domingo's and Pavarotti's."

Perlman does not overstate matters. However, he does omit the fact that the remarkable qualities of the cantor's voice are more evidently on display because of the hauntingly, stunningly beautiful sounds of his magical violin.

Perlman introduces each of the 10 tracks with a violin flourish, sometimes playful, sometimes doleful, but always informative and foreshadowing of the unfolding music or prayer. Indeed six of the CD tracks are part of the liturgy of the Jewish people. And it is the duet of the two "voices" in these prayers that elevates the album from engaging listening to what the album itself promises, namely, eternal echoes of a way of life, a way of relating to God authored by the heart of a people's experiences rather than the mind of a liturgical writer.

Perlman has the rare ability to convey the deeply intended essence of a musical phrase. Thus, even as he draws the bow across the strings of the violin in the tunes of the prayers, he also draws across the strings of collective and individual memory, stirring the associations each of us may have with men and women, places or times when we heard or sang those very prayers ourselves.

Helfgot sings the tunes. Perlman sometimes plays the melody, or a backdrop, or a harmony. Together however, they create a profoundly different expression and experience of prayer.

This album is a far-reaching musical and cultural achievement. Perlman has now added a third album to the important audio archive he is creating of Ashkenazi music along with Tradition: Popular Jewish Melodies and Klezmer in the Fiddler's House.

One need not be familiar with the traditions, tunes and folkways of Ashkenazi Jewry to take particular delight in this album. It would undoubtedly have meaning for anyone who seeks some of his own truths in music.

Washing elephants in southern Thailand

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

With a grunt of pleasure, the elephants amble slowly into a pool of deep, muddy water. Kneel down and wallow in what can only be described as elephant ecstasy.

The temperature in southern Thailand is hovering at 35 C and for a few minutes we can't help but feel a little jealous that they get to swim while we have to watch. Then we notice elephant excrement the size of whole cantaloupes floating nearby, and any smidgeon of jealousy evaporates immediately. Those elephants are going to need a good wash when they emerge from their cesspool – and we're the ones who will be washing them.

I'm at Elephant Hills, a luxury tented resort on the doorstep of Khao Sok National Park in Thailand, and a place that's as close as you can get to a retirement home for elephants. Most of the resort's 14 elephants worked previously in the logging industry, but when the Thai government outlawed logging in 1989 the elephants needed a new way to earn their costly upkeep.

Many of them now serve as the docile carriers in elephant back safaris, a wildly popular tourist activity. Though for the lucky few at Elephant Hills, life is no more complicated than a daily stroll for exercise, a massive bucket of fruit salad and a good wash by visitors who want a more intimate elephant encounter than at a safari.

Earlier, with hatchets in hand, we prepared their afternoon snack, slicing pineapple, watermelon, bunches of bananas and bamboo into a trough. With their mahouts carefully balanced on their backs, the elephants approached us for food, their trunks curling around the fruit offerings and moving large quantities into their mouths. Given that their daily food consumption totals 250 kilograms, our fruit was a mere snack and a coveted delicacy. When the bucket was empty it was time for a swim, and soon after, a much needed bath.

The elephants are nothing if not obedient. They follow their mahouts' commands with intelligence, waiting patiently as they are hosed down and then scrubbed with loofah-like coconut husks. It's an outdoor elephant spa and our job is to deliver the full-body exfoliating scrub, a wash that promises to leave their leathery skin cleaner – if not smoother.

Get up close to an elephant with loofah in hand and you can truly appreciate the enormity of these gentle creatures. The goliaths of the animal world, they can weigh up to 5,000 kg by the time they reach adulthood. "They have a special bond with their mahouts," says Mark Holland, camp co-ordinator at Elephant Hills,

Mahouts, those individuals who have the closest relationship with elephants, are in increasingly limited supply in Thailand, as many have abandoned their careers to start new lives in the cities. [Lauren Kramer photo]

"And they're incredibly smart – they can understand up to 30 spoken commands."

Watching the mahouts engage with their elephants is an eye opening experience. They sit across the animal's neck, their feet or knees pressing against the nerve centers behind the elephant's ears. Using an elephant hook, the mahouts are able to give their elephants additional instructions, concentrating their attention in a way that cannot always be achieved through voice or touch.

In a time when modernization has reduced the traditional role of the elephant in Thai culture, the mahout is more valuable than ever, for without them, domesticated elephants cannot be properly cared for. Sadly, though, the mahout culture is as threatened by modernity as the elephant itself. Many mahouts have deserted their hooks in favour of the "glamour" of driving an air-conditioned truck, resulting in a mahout brain drain in the forests of Thailand.

Back at the resort we take a rafting trip downriver, spotting a yellow diamondback snake hanging from a tree along the way.

"Don't worry, their bite is not poisonous," our guide Por says encouragingly, as we paddle quickly away. The tangled mass of jungle that is Khao Sok National Park is teeming with wildlife, including gibbons that swing from tree to tree, Malaysian sun bears, monitor lizards, macaques, a goat-antelope called the serow and hornbills. It's also where you'll find close relatives of the world's largest flower, the rafflesia, whose cooked buds or flowers can be used to help fever or backache, or as a sexual stimulant in Thai traditional medicine.

We have to content ourselves with scenery, though, for the wildlife is well hidden in the mid-afternoon heat. That night we fall asleep to the sound of the Sok River gurgling not far from our tents and the cicadas piercing chorus. A monkey whoops from the thick undergrowth, its primeval sound a quick reminder that we're oh-so-far from home.

Located in Khao Sok National Park, Elephant Hills offers all-inclusive, tented accommodations with flush toilets and hot showers at its two camps: Elephant Hills and the Rainforest Camp. Excursion packages range from one to four days and include transportation from major hubs to and from the camps, intimate elephant encounters, jungle trekking, canoe trips on the lake and river and evening entertainment. They range in price from 9,400 baht ($313) for a one-night, two-day package, to 22,900 baht ($763) for a three-night, four-day package per person.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS

THE RABBI'S CAT (LE CHAT DU RABBIN)

Le Chat du Rabbini, the beloved graphic novel of French comic artist Joann Sfar, has sold over 900,000 copies, and now makes it to the big screen in this whimsical and visually-stunning animated film. In pre-war Algiers, Rabbi Sfar lives a quiet life by the sea with his beautiful daughter Zlabya and her talking cat. Along with a Russian painter and a wise old Arab Sheikh, Sfar and the mischievous pet set out on a quest into the unknown depths of Africa. Using hand-drawn animation, Sfar and co-director Delesvaux recreate the multicultural community of 1920s Algiers in vivid and loving detail. This much-anticipated film adaptation makes its Toronto Premiere at this special screening, co-presented with The Beguiling comic art shop.

After tragedy, kicker puts best foot forward

Matt Samuels
The Times of Israel

HOUSTON — Robert Hersh had a chance to live out every football kicker's dream: tie game, four seconds left and a 47-yard field goal attempt separating his team from victory.

All the pressure and all the eyes in Reliant Stadium were focused on the Texas Southern University (TSU) kicker.

For Robert, however, it was much more than a dream.

The challenge was just the latest chapter in what has become an emotional college experience.

In 2009, as a college freshman, Robert lost his mother and paternal grandfather to cancer.

In 2010, his 11 field goals and 34 extra points helped Texas Southern win the Southwestern Athletic Conference for the first time in school history.

In 2011, a pre-season leg injury cost him the season, leaving Robert unsure whether he would ever play college football again.

So making a game-deciding field goal in front of thousands of people may not have been the toughest challenge that the 22-year-old has faced in his life.

"For anyone to go through what he has is a living hell, but for an 18-year-old college freshman making the transition from high school alone — much less playing in football stadiums before crowds of 40,000 — is unbelievable," said Edward Hersh, Robert's father.

Robert earned football all-district kicking honours in his junior and senior years at Pearland High School, and was recruited by several out-of-state schools. But in March 2008, he learned that his mother, Shellie Hersh, had been diagnosed with cancer.

"It was very hard for all of us," Robert said. "I had a lot of sadness. I had a lot of anger. You just always ask yourself, 'Why?'"

Instead of leaving the state, Robert decided to stay close to home and accepted a full athletic scholarship at Texas Southern, a historically black college in the heart of Houston.

Though being one of the few white players on the team — and the only Jewish one — may sound like he was a little out of place, it was the best situation for Robert.

"I honestly didn't even know what TSU was at first," he said. "I visited the campus, and the school is great. More importantly for me, I wanted to stay close to my mom."

He handled the kicking and punting duties for the Tigers in his freshman year. He made eight field goals and 30 extra points in 2008, with his mother and father attending every home game.

Robert's older brother, Jonathan Hersh, was a senior, kicking for the Austin College football team. "I told him, 'Mom's not quitting. Mom's still fighting. By you and me playing football, that gives Mom high hopes.' I think her coming to our games, it gave her hope, and something to look forward to."

His mother had a whole team rooting for her. After Robert's three field goals led to a 30-29 Texas Southern win over Alcorn State, the Tigers dedicated a signed game ball to her. TSU coach Johnnie Cole and all of the team captains brought the ball to the University of Texas MD Anderson Cancer Center in Houston to present it to Shellie.

The Hersh family got to know Robert's extended TSU football family as well. The family hosted 15 players for Thanksgiving that year, and they all fell in love with Shellie.

"Try cooking for a football team," Edward said. "It was awesome. It also was Robert's older brother, Jonathan Hersh, was a senior, kicking for the Austin College football team.

"I told Robbie, 'We don't really know why this is a part of God's universe,'" Rabbi Morgen said. "God forbid we should think it is a punishment. It's really just a random thing, and our job as concerned Jewish people is to take care of people who are sick and make sure they are comfortable."

"I just tried to provide support to his mom and their whole family. I wanted to continue encouraging Robbie to stick with his skills and talents."

For Robert, the experience brought him closer to his spiritual side.

"I used to say I was just a relaxed Jewish guy because we would have football on Friday nights and that great Texas barbecue," Robert said.

"After my mom passed away, it really helped going to synagogue. It helped me find healing and guidance. Rabbi Morgen has helped me out so much. He has been my teacher and mentor."

Robert Hersh [YouTube screenshot]

Robbie's last Thanksgiving with his mom. She was overjoyed to have a house full of football players, and when it was time to return to the dorms, each boy gave her a hug and kiss."

Unfortunately, the cancer pain was so severe that the next day, Shellie was rushed to the hospital, never to return home.

She passed away in February 2009. More than 600 people attended her funeral and memorial services, including coaches and teammates from TSU, as well as high school football coaches and former players and teachers.

"My teammates have been so supportive of me from the start," Robert said. "It really meant a lot to me."

Making things even tougher was the fact that his grandfather, David Hersh, passed away a month before Shellie.

Part of Robert's healing came in the synagogue. Congregation Beth Yeshurun

Robert continued studying and playing football. He made seven field goals and 23 extra points in his sophomore year, and had his best year as a junior, making 11 field goals and 34 extra points.

His junior year ended strong, with several big kicks that propelled the Tigers into the Southwestern Athletic Conference championship game.

During each game, Robert wore a necklace that he gave his mother just before her passing.

"It just helped me feel like she was a part of everything I was doing," he said.

Heading into his senior year in 2011, he was one of the top kickers in the conference, aiming to build on his three years at TSU. Then, at a practice, he heard something snap.

He had torn a quad muscle in his right leg, and would not be able to kick in a game for a full year.

With 2011 being his senior year and the Texas Southern coaching staff on the way out, Robert did not know if he ever would get a chance to kick again collegiately.

He was granted a medical redshirt, which is common for season-long injuries in college sports, and was allowed to come back for a fifth year in 2012.

The new staff, led by head coach Darrell Ashberry, not only welcomed him back, but last month named him one of the team captains.

Rabbi Morgen, whom Robert invited to speak to the TSU team a few years back, could not be happier for his former pupil.

"We are all very proud of him," the rabbi said. "I think the most amazing thing is he always has such a positive attitude. He is always smiling and is just a nice, generous and kind person."

"He doesn't take for granted his talents — he is very grateful for them. He is just a good kid who works hard and does well."

Now, more than three years after his mother's death and a full year from his injury, Robert looks to finish what he started. He will graduate from TSU in May 2013 with a degree in education. He hopes to go into special education and coaching.

But before that, he has some unfinished business to take care of on the football field.

The Tigers were big underdogs in the Labor Day Classic against Prairie View, not having beaten their conference rival since 2006.

In a back-and-forth game, Robert already had kicked two field goals and five extra points. The score was tied at 41 with four seconds left.

He trotted onto the field, looked 47 yards at the big yellow uprights and tried to clear his head before taking a deep breath.

"It's hard to block everything out," he said. "To be honest, I was thinking about my mom. I think it helped me be more calm and relaxed."

As the snap went back to the holder, Robert took his steps toward the ball and launched it straight down the middle, setting off a huge celebration on the field.

"As soon as I planted my foot and kicked it, I knew it was going in," he said. "I looked up and started celebrating and got tackled by all of my teammates. It was amazing. It feels like we just won the national championship."

"It's been a roller-coaster ride, but I know my mom has been here with me the whole time," Robert said. "When I first got here, I wanted to just graduate and be done," he said. "Now I want to stay and enjoy every last minute of it. I just wish my mom was here for my senior year. But I know she is always there with me in spirit, no matter what."

Doreen Brownstone

Doyenne of Winnipeg theatre turns 90

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Doreen Brownstone turned 90 recently, and to celebrate her special birthday, her friends and colleagues in Winnipeg's theatre community threw her a party to remember.

About 150 people were on hand Sept. 28 at the Royal Manitoba Theatre Centre (MTC) lobby to greet Winnipeg's oldest working actress as she stepped out of the limo and walked down the red carpet. She spent most of the evening seated on a throne as friends serenaded her with songs, stories and good wishes.

"It was the most wonderful night of my life," Brownstone said. "I felt like the Queen on a walkabout."

Brownstone shows no sign of slowing down. She is really excited about an upcoming documentary on her career and a major role in a movie that is being shot locally. Both projects are being developed by the film production team of Angus Kohm and his partner, Stefanie Wiens.

"We thought it would be great to capture one of her performances on film because most of her best performances were on stage," Kohm said.

Kohm is comparing The Doreen Brownstone Movie to HBO's Curb Your Enthusiasm, in which Larry David plays himself. Brownstone will play a fictionalized version of herself as a one-time movie star who, at 90, has to accept work in more questionable, lower-budget films. It will also focus on her apartment block and her relationship with her colourful neighbours.

For the documentary, Kohm and Wiens have spent the last five months doing interviews with friends and former castmates.

"Doreen is an ideal subject for a documentary," said Wiens, who recalled first meeting Brownstone in 1993 in an MTC production of Fiddler on the Roof. "We think of her as a local treasure, but she is much more. While doing interviews for the documentary in Toronto, we interviewed Miriam Newhouse, a business rep in the industry. She told us that when Doreen turned 80, ACTRA [the national actors union] had to create a new category for her. There were no other professional actors in Canada who were over 80. Her life is a snapshot of Canadian theatre history."

Wiens praised Brownstone for her courage, integrity, sense of adventure and perseverance.

Brownstone hails from England where she first performed on stage in 1943. She came to Canada as a war bride. In her early years here, while still raising a family, she worked as a swimming teacher.

Brownstone returned to the stage in the late 1950s, working with John Hirsch and Tom Hendry, the founders of the Manitoba Theatre Centre. She co-starred with Gordon Pinsent in MTC's inaugural production, A Half of Rain, in 1958.

Over the past 55 years, she has graced countless Winnipeg stages with her talents. In the past 15 to 20 years, she has also played roles in several television series and locally shot full-length movies.

"I like to work," she said, "but I am at the age where if offers come, they come, if not not. I could play Yenta the Matchmaker tomorrow. I played the role in seven different productions [most recently last June in a Yiddish-language version of Fiddler]. I don't know though if I could still do eight shows a week."

"I thank the Lord that I still have my health and mental faculties."

Although Brownstone doesn't have any stage parts lined up yet for this season, she will be helping the MTC with its tribute to Stephen Sondheim in January and has some bit parts in local movies.

Toronto accountant shines in sportscasting competition

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

There's no stopping Andrew Damelin when he starts talking about sports. The 29-year-old chartered accountant and aspiring sportscaster has been a sports fan since he was a child. One of his earliest memories is of attending a Toronto Maple Leafs game for his seventh birthday.

But even though his love for sports continued throughout high school – he said he was the only “white guy” on the Vaughan Road Academy Vipers basketball team, and was called “Screech” by the home crowd because of his “Jewfro” – he never really considered turning it into a career.

“I was so terrified to go into a career that the pay is so dicey,” said Damelin, who grew up in Forest Hill in Toronto. “You know the pressures of the Jewish community – you’ve got to be a doctor, lawyer or accountant. I just decided to go for the safe route.”

The safe route, in his case, was to become an accountant. He never looked back, until he saw an ad for Gillette Drafted, a reality show on the Score network that searches for “Canada’s next sportscaster.” He tried out every year for three years, never making it past the first auditions.

This year, he impressed the judges with his knowledge of the financial and economic side of basketball and his video interviewing Boston sports fans about the controversies surrounding their sports teams.

“This year was different. I went there with the attitude that I don’t care and I’m just going to be myself,” he said.

He was one of 24 finalists, out of about 800 who auditioned, and made it to the next round: sportscasting boot camp. They went through challenges including a sports trivia test, a co-hosting challenge and a teleprompter read.

“Obviously, I was terrified to do it. I had no experience at all in front of the camera, except for my cousin’s bar mitzvah, when they had this Entertainment Tonight theme and they asked me to be the host,” he said.

The finalists also made their own promotional videos. Damelin made a parody video about the Leafs, which he called A Franchise that I Used to Know to the tune of Gotye’s hit summer tune, Somebody that I Used to Know. It went viral and has had more than 120,000 views.

“It went totally beyond any of my expectations,” Damelin said. “It got lots of people saying that I’m meant to do this, that I’ve created something different, unique, and no other competitor created a video that had any mass appeal.”

This helped him land a spot as one of six finalists chosen for the reality show itself, which was filmed over 10 days in August, without quitting his accounting job.

“In the beginning, everyone was rather friendly, but as days went on, people got more tired, more stressed, and tensions went up,” he said. “There are 50 people on set staring at you while you do your talent, and you only get one shot at everything. I had a great time doing it.”

The winner will be chosen on the basis of on-air presence, sports IQ and online voting.

Despite the pressure and competition, Damelin said this has been the most unforgettable experience of his life. “To have an opportunity to enjoy life, and [to spend it] on something safe or not so meaningful to me is such a waste, and I’m going after that dream [job] now,” he said.

His blog, which can be found at damelin.net, is about the NBA and NFL, and was also just picked up by another publication.

The results of this year’s Gillette Drafted will be aired in a live show on Nov. 12.

“If I don’t win, then Nov. 13 I’ll get my application ready and contact as many people as I know in the industry and try to get in. I’m going to pursue this and keep writing and keep making videos,” he said. “I haven’t gotten paid for any of this, but this is the most fun professionally I’ve ever had.”

Israel's innovative water technologies

On Kol Nidrei night, I was once again asked by my congregation to make the annual State of Israel Bond appeal. For 14 years, I have related the value of that investment opportunity in Israel, in terms of supported infrastructure projects. This year, my focus was water.

In September 2011, documents were released by Israel's Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor's Foreign Trade Administration, Investment Promotion Centre. The Israel's Water Sector presentation, along with the brochure Israel's Water Industry: A History of Turning Desert into Oasis, summarize statistics that explain what drives Israel's leadership in the water sector.

An Israeli consumes 250 litres of water a day. By comparison, Canada's water consumption rate is about 325 litres of water a day, according to a 2010 McKinsey and Company summarization of a Water Resources Group report.

In Israel, 49 per cent of available water is used for agriculture, 35 per cent for domestic use, six per cent by industry and the remaining 10 per cent is used to supply neighbouring areas or other natural uses. Through improved efficiency and technological innovation, Israel's total water consumption has remained nearly the same since 1964, in spite of a growing population and agriculture. In Canada, where fresh water is in abundant supply, finding a comparative breakdown is difficult. We know that water is used to generate electricity, raise crops, develop the Oil Sands, produce forest products and manufacture consumer goods. Water-intensive manufacturing sectors including food and beverage face direct challenges with respect to sourcing water of sufficient quality and quantity.

Israel's water consumption in 2010 was 2,030 million cubic metres (MCM) per year, of which only 1,170 MCM is refilled by natural means. To help with Israeli rainfall, we add, "Mashiv ha'ruach u'morid hageshem," to our daily Shmoneh Esrei prayers between Shmini Atzeret and Passover. Prayer will only get us so far.

This scarcity of water in Israel has led to innovation. Israeli scientists have managed to turn the country into a world leader in innovative water technologies.

According to Israel Bonds, the country has some 166 water-technology enterprises, including 91 companies offering water-efficiency solutions, 50 firms specializing in waste-water reuse and desalination, and another 25 offering water control and command systems.

Israel's capabilities in water technologies include: water recycling and management, leakage and water-loss detection and prevention through the use of advanced metering, analyzers and control systems, advanced irrigation and desalination.

Water desalination converts saltwater so that it may be suitable for irrigation. Israel is pioneering cost-effective ways of providing fresh water for regions where its availability is limited. Infrastructure build-out is supported by Israel Bonds. The world's largest seawater reverse-osmosis desalination plant opened in Hadera in May 2010. With two more plants planned for the near future, Israel predicts that two-thirds of the nation's water will be provided by five plants when all of them are in operation.

Over the next few articles we will look at ways Israeli water technology could bring value to Canada.

A cantorial reggae singer

When I was a child in Kitchener, Ont., children in the Talmud Torah were asked to lead the concluding prayers of the Shabbat services while standing on the bimah. It was a glorious time. One of those children had a distinguishing voice, an angelic one. His name is John (Uncle Jonny) Strauss. Today, he is a reggae star.

Jon has singing in his blood. His mother, Shirley, was a professional singer and taught the girls their bat mitzvah songs. Years later, Jon was mentored by the cantors Efraim Sapir and Tibor Kovari and had, what he called, "the honour" of working with the late composer Sruel Irving Glick. "He was a real inspiration for me in terms of Jewish songs and prayer."

To this day, Jon, 52, leads Shacharit services on Rosh Hashanah and Shabbat Musaf services at Beth Tikvah Congregation. He has written music for some of the Musaf services. Jon said he enjoys being a cantor and finds it "very spiritual and helps me connect to God when I am singing to Him."

In 1990, Jon wrote and recorded a single with a reggae legend, the late Sugar Minott. This is when his reggae career began. Jon, who runs a chain of menswear stores by day, said he liked the message reggae music was sending, which he qualifies as "soulful" and, in fact, he makes a correlation between Jewish song and prayer and reggae, melodies that emanate from Jamaica.

"Both styles are spiritual, conscious forms of music," he said. "If you listen to some of the great reggae singers from the past like Burning Spear and Dennis Brown, you can hear a cantorial style in some of their music and singing." Since the days Jon fell in love with reggae, he has seamlessly made the transition to becoming a performer in that genre. A couple of years back, I saw my childhood best friend sing at the Lula Lounge in Toronto. All his family was there. The music was original, and the musicians and instruments were all real. I was amazed watching Jon dancing on the stage with Caribbean backup singers. There he stood, a cap on his head, looking very Jewish, belting out words of freedom and love as they would be on the island of Jamaica.

Bake cake and do not remove from pan. After cake has cooled, make holes in top of cake using a large fork. Pour (one at a time) fudge, butterscotch, and condensed milk over the top of the cake and let each soak in before adding the next.

Crush 3 candy bars and sprinkle on top of cake. Place dollops of whipping topping over cake; crush 3 remaining toffee bars to decorate the top.

In between songs he talked and expressed his message of unity of all person-kind and the need for change. In his own words: "I hope to break down racial barriers and help people grow. I want my music to mean something; to make a difference."

And indeed it does. Jon does not shy away from any topic. His debut album, Singing With Legends, features a song called My Sister, about his sibling, Robyn, who died March 27, 2001. The song focuses on Robyn's life, not her death, and states: "Full of life, so sensitive, her heart so big she'd always give... she was... she was taken way too fast, the emptiness will never pass, her memory must always last... She was... she was, she was, she was, she was my sister."

Most recently, Jon sang with the acclaimed rock steady and reggae vocal trio, The Hep-tones. On Jamaica Day 2012, Jon sang his heart out in front of 2,000 reggae lovers.

On Oct. 21, Jon performs at the Rokaz Easy Edition, an evening that includes reggae superstars Horace Andy and Big Youth from Jamaica. For more information, call 905-547-9491.

The wedding must go on

Jennifer Libman
Special to the CJN

You can expect the week leading up to your wedding to be busy. There are vendors to confirm, a guest list to finalize, and tuxedos to pick up. You can expect to be running around and to feel overwhelmed, but you can't prepare for what we faced.

The Tuesday before my wedding, I awoke to see a 5 a.m. missed phone call from Mike's dad in Chicago. Mike's mom, who had been battling cancer for over a year, had died overnight. The next thing I knew, my sister and parents were over and we were booking a flight to Chicago for that afternoon to attend her funeral the next day.

Despite the tragic turn of events, there was no doubt that the show must go on. Jewish law dictates that once you schedule a marriage, you cannot cancel it due to any circumstances. Not only were we following Jewish tradition, but we were honouring Mike's mom who had been excited about our wedding since before we even got engaged.

Jews have gotten married for thousands of years in less than ideal circumstances, and even though we experienced a tragedy, we knew we were lucky to be surrounded by family and friends who loved us.

Thursday afternoon I flew back to Toronto, and on Friday Mike, along with the rest of his family, began arriving. At our rehearsal dinner on Saturday night, it was surreal to see Mike's family and friends from Chicago in such a different context than we had seen them just days before at the funeral. You could tell that the energy in the room was high and everyone was putting their sorrow behind them so they could celebrate our marriage.

And then the day we had been planning for and eagerly waiting for over a year arrived. Sunday, Aug. 5, was finally here. My mom, my bridesmaids and I arrived at the synagogue early to prepare for the day. Hair, makeup, pictures, and then the ceremony would begin. I could hardly breathe I was so excited.

As I walked down the aisle towards Mike I could literally feel the love and support that surrounded me. I was completely overcome with emotion. For the second time in a week we were in a room full of people crying, only this time there was no sadness.

The rest of the evening was more magical than we could have imagined. We danced all night, and we knew that Mike's mom was dancing with us.

We experienced the full spectrum of emotions and feelings that week. A life ended, and our new life, as husband and wife, began. We emerged from the week as a stronger couple. We learned very early on in our marriage that you always need to expect the unexpected and that we can deal with tragedy and support each other through whatever life throws at us.

Tales from a (married) broad

Pearl Adler Saban
Special to The CJN

On Dec. 19, 1993, according to Jewish law, I became a Mrs. I stood under the chupah as our rabbi did his part, as our two witnesses did their parts, as seven of our guests did their parts, and as my husband-to-be said – and did – his part.

L'chaim! Ron and I were now partners. Joining forces to become one. Two halves becoming a whole. A pot that had found its lid.

I believed in these two mottoes and claimed them for myself:

- Good things come to those who wait.
- God saves the best for last. Happily, I have been repeating these affirmations for nearly 19 years.

Paradise Banquet Hall was the setting that day – kabalat panim, chupah and dinner all took place within its various, well-appointed social halls.

Isn't it oh-so-fitting to begin a marriage in paradise! In essence, you're there before even getting there. Upon being asked, "Where did you get married?" I like to be clever and jokingly reply, "I started married life in 'paradise'; it's been hell ever since."

Being a writer and editor, and working at the time for a publisher of romance fiction, I felt I just had to make a speech on my wedding day. Over the years, I had written speeches for other people to help mark their personal celebrations, be it anniversaries, bar mitzvahs, weddings or birthdays; finally I could write one for myself. My words were peppered with publishing and literary references, and as I shared my thoughts with our families, our guests and my new husband, I had no doubt in my mind that our life together was going to become a well-loved bestseller.

Three children later, our lives were made even more complete.

I'm still writing and editing, but more importantly, I'm still turning the pages of that well-loved bestseller of mine... called marriage. Sometimes I'm forced to read between the lines, do some minor editing and rewrites if necessary, but I don't have to read too far ahead to know how the story plays out. The book's dust jacket says it all: "Easy to read. Likable characters who interact well. A simple – yet entertaining – story line, with its adventure, drama, humour and romance. A keeper!"

There used to be a poster on my wall at work, which read: "A good book is a wonder and a joy." To that I can add: "So is a good marriage!"

Matchmaking service for secular Jews

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Rachel Zelunka is trying to fill a void in the Toronto social scene.

The 32-year-old wife of Rabbi Mark Zelunka, spiritual leader of Aish Campus Toronto, has started up findmysoulmate.ca, a matchmaking service for secular men and women of all ages.

The seeds for her service came about, she said, when she met singles attending Aish Campus events. "I always thought about setting them up, and I finally decided to do something about it."

She started by telling a few people about her service, and "it spread by word of mouth. I was shocked by the number of people that contacted me. [The service] has grown bigger than I anticipated. It has driven me to work harder."

Zelunka has received requests from people from other cities, she said, but because she conducts face-to-face initial interviews, they must come to Toronto to meet her.

She said she's been contacted by about 100 people, but she's still interviewing them and hasn't started matching them yet.

At the interview, she said, in addition to the usual questions such as religious background, lifestyle and interests, she delves into their past relationships.

"I try to get them to pinpoint where these relationships went wrong and coach them to be self-aware – what sets them off, what they like, what annoys them. [My theory is] if you don't know who you are, you don't know who you want to be with."

She stresses that the service is not a dating site, "but an 'I want to get married or be in a long-term relationship' site. Members cannot browse other profiles, and everything is confidential."

When she meets two people she thinks may be right for each other, "and if they both agree, phone numbers are exchanged. I don't push people together just because they are available. That is not fair to anyone."

Zelunka said that although there is a charge for findmysoulmate.ca, it's not a business. "I do it purely for chesed. I like to see people get together."

Navigating your new family

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

They say that when you marry your spouse, you marry their family, too – and truer words were never spoken.

Your relationship with your spouse's family will have a significant effect on your married life, so it makes sense to nourish those familial relationships with time and sensitivity, to ensure the roads ahead are peaceful and happy ones.

"Remember that you're entering another person's world with its own history, relationship and roles," cautions Dr. Melodie Schaefer, a psychologist at the Chicago School of Professional Psychology Counselling Center.

"Take time to find out the family's values and how they communicate, and remember to do so with respect, curiosity and openness to new experiences."

Beware, Mind-Reader

Too often, people think they're mind readers and fortune tellers, Schaefer says. We've all been there: in the position of assuming we know why our in-laws are saying or doing something, and more often than not, those assumptions set a negative cycle into motion. "Rather, be curious and try to find out what they mean," she suggests. "Don't assume they have any negative perception of you or your relationship."

The importance of getting to know your new family members – future father- and mother-in-laws and brother- and sister-in-laws cannot be underestimated, says Irina Firstein, a New York City couples therapist. "Really get to know them," she insists.

"Many pre-wedding issues are simply the result of the fact that a wedding brings change. They may feel like they are losing their child to a new spouse, and they may feel threatened, as if they will no longer be important or needed. Try to understand, be kind and empathic."

Honour Rituals

One part of getting to know your spouse's family is honouring their Jewish rituals and celebrations. "This is one way you can integrate yourself in the family and become more connected to them," Schaefer says. "Reach out and ask them about plans for the holidays and how you can become a part of those plans, especially in the first year or two."

Chances are, you'll want to spend the Jewish holidays with your own family, and adjusting to the needs of two families takes patience and consideration. If possible, try to include both families in celebrations. When that's not feasible, remember to play fair and divide holiday celebration time so you can spend time with both families.

One-On-One

It's different getting to know a group of people than fostering relationships one-on-one. Schaefer suggests brides reach out to their future mother- and/or sister-in-law and invite each of them out to lunch. "Set up meetings to cultivate individual relationships," she says. "It's a wonderful way of putting your hand out, extending yourself and showing that you care enough to spend time and get to know a person individually."

Open The Door

The new family unit that you and your spouse have created is like a house. Your spouse's family will want to enter that house, and it's imperative that you open the metaphorical door, Schaefer adds.

"Be aware that sometimes your spouse's family will want to become involved in your life, but they won't know how to. They'll be looking to see if the door is open or closed, and you need to open it and invite them in, not wait for them to peep through the windows or try to push open the door. Yes, boundaries are important, but you don't want to leave them out in the cold."

Tactful Tips

You're Not An Island: Give up the fantasy that after the wedding, it's all about the two of you. That's not realistic, unless your spouse has disowned his or her family and has nothing to do with them. If you try to exclude your spouse's family, you may hurt your spouse.

Don't Talk Dirty: Don't talk negatively about your spouse to his or her family, or vice versa. This is a sure way to damage the relationship.

Stay Out of the Drama: Every family has its issues, and there may be family members who want to drag you into those issues and air their grievances. Rather than take sides, try to stay neutral when it comes to the family drama, while being a listening ear.

Kid-friendly weddings

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Kids and weddings often don't go together well. What child in their right mind would truly want to be gussied up in their smartest clothes while listening to adults drone on and on at a ceremony that's unfamiliar at best and boring at worst?

Add a whole lotta kissing, the added sugar rush of carbonated drinks and an exceptionally long day and you have a perfect recipe for a meltdown.

There's a way around this scenario, although it takes some creativity and forethought. With the right preparations in advance, your wedding could be a celebration that both the young and the young at heart will enjoy.

Dress for Success: If kids are uncomfortable in their clothes, you're off to a bad start. So when choosing the outfit they'll wear at the wedding, ensure it feels good on their skin, doesn't pinch their bodies and doesn't cause any more fidgeting than you'd normally expect.

Get them Involved: A busy, engaged kid is a happy kid, so think of ways to involve them in your wedding day. Depending on the age and disposition of the children at your wedding, you could give them tasks such as ushering guests to their seats, handing out confetti bags or bubble blowers, or delivering programs as guests arrive. Remember to keep kids four and under close to mom and dad for the most part and let them know their job will be to shower the newlyweds with confetti or bubbles as they leave the ceremony.

A Friendly Venue: Many venues will gladly help out in keeping kids entertained, so as you're venue-shopping, be sure to inform potential venues that there will be kids at the reception. Some may be able to offer an extra room where kids can play. If you're using a room for dressing, ask if it can be the kids' play area once you're done. Consider bringing some age-appropriate toys or crafts – even a bouncy castle, if space and weather permits.

You'll want to schedule two types of activities: active, energized playing while you're having your photographs done, and quieter, more focused play during the reception. Entertainers such as clowns, magicians or balloon artists might be a good idea, but if your budget is limited, fill an old trunk with dress-up clothes purchased from the local thrift store, or borrow old outfits from friends.

Bring on the Crafts: Planning a kids' table at the reception? Forget the floral centerpiece – it has no place there. Instead, fill a basket with fun treats from the dollar store, including games, bubbles, stickers, stamps, skipping rope, puzzles and crosswords. With the right selection of arts and crafts – such as coloured paper, washable markers and crayons and glue – kids can make personalized cards for the bride and groom. A great time to start this activity is in the minutes before and during the speeches. When the dancing starts, get the DJ or band to play a "kids only" number so they can work off some of their energy, then entice them with a favourite DVD in a quiet, secured space so they can relax as mom and dad dance the night away.

Get A Sitter: Kids mean childcare is necessary, and unless you have a designated sitter or two, parents will be the primary caregivers. If you can afford one or more sitters, shoot for a ratio of at least one sitter for every 10 children. This way, you'll know they're under watchful eyes.

Kid Food: Hungry kids are cranky kids, and it's no secret that most kids find adult food less than tempting. If there will be 10 or more kids at your wedding, consider providing them with a specialized menu that will appeal directly to them. It might include mac and cheese, pizza, veggie dip or chicken strips with a honey garlic dip. Some caterers will put together special kid beverages that look like the adult equivalent but are alcohol free, such as virgin strawberry margaritas, or soda water with elderflower syrup, which looks like champagne.

Friendly Favours: I've never seen a kid that doesn't love a party favour, so consider having a special selection of favours for the little ones. They needn't be over-the-top or unaffordable. Items such as paper and pencil crayons, colouring books, model kits, and jewelry-making kits always go down well and the forethought is appreciated by both kids and their parents.

My wife's new hat

Ben Goldenberg
Special to The CJN

I'll tell you about my first Rosh Hashanah as a married man. My glamorous, fashionista wife, Samara, was bursting with excitement because for the first time she would be sporting a new accessory to synagogue: a hat.

We have been married now for just over a month and every day I'm learning that despite Samara being a member of a Conservative synagogue she has some fairly religious ideals.

My family has always kept kosher, walked to synagogue, etc. but, to me, wearing a hat has always seemed to serve a religious function. Regardless, it is nice, as a new family, to begin setting precedents for how we will practise Judaism in our house. Will we walk to shul? Will we keep kosher? Many of these questions we discussed before becoming betrothed, yet I am regularly startled by these certain religious requirements that appear sporadically; toivelling the dishes being the most recent (this is the act of bathing new kitchenware at the mikvah before use).

Samara and Ben after the wedding ceremony

Samara grew up worshipping at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue while I at Beth Tzedec Congregation. The shoreshim of the names are indicative of analogous congregations: both parking lots have all the usual exotic German-made sedans, both have hallways crammed with running "tweenagers" and, within the sanctuaries, the repetitive "Shhhhh!" resonates more frequently than the shofar. Suffice to say, for my first Rosh Hashanah away from my alma mater I felt at home; contrarily, to Samara the hat was tantamount to the tallit a boy wears upon becoming bar mitzvah – this was a big day!

As we strolled down the aisle for the first time since our wedding, Samara swaggered proudly. The rabbi noticed her hat instantly and gave a thumbs-up, but otherwise there was a lacklustre response. "Nobody recognized me and nobody else was wearing a hat," she whimpered during our walk home.

Her comments led to a discussion regarding the venerational quality of congregants in modern Conservative synagogues. In the one service, we counted two iPhones, 33-1/2 bare shoulders and one fully exposed back. Subsequently, we have decided that she would continue to wear her hat as a role model for the next generation. We want our (future) children to grow up practising some of the traditional facets of Judaism that made this great religion what it is today.

On top of the world

Sarah Wajchendler
Special to The CJN

David and I had been together eight years now. We were high school sweethearts and still in love.

It was a Wednesday night at the end of June and David was working late downtown. He phoned me and said that his co-worker was unable to go on the CN Tower EdgeWalk and that the co-worker had sold him his tickets for half price.

We had always talked about going, but never followed through on it. Of course I wanted to go! We arranged to meet at Union Station in Toronto within the hour.

After hanging up, I got suspicious about the arrangement he made because I mean, why else would he spend this much money, randomly? The thought of a proposal came to my mind, as we had spoken about getting married in the near future. Although I was excited, I knew I shouldn't be getting my hopes too high. After all, I already knew he was the one. Whether the proposal was today or next month or next year, it didn't matter.

To the CN Tower EdgeWalk we went – we goofed around, checked out the CN Tower grounds, and took our time eating and talking about our day. It was how we always acted. I started to forget about the idea of a proposal. He wasn't convincing me.

Before the EdgeWalk, we were asked to empty our pockets, take off our jewelry and tie our shoes extra tight. Even our glasses were tied to our necks. There was no way we could take anything with us up there. It was strict safety measures, and they made sure of it. Definitely no proposal up there.

During one of the standard checks, a chaperone told David his waivers were not signed. He left the room and came back soon after. I didn't think anything of it.

Up we went in the elevator to the top of the city. Now I could see David's nerves brewing. This was his usual self; he was nervous like this when we were skydiving. I must say he held his composure as we walked around the outside circumference of the 553-metre tower. We participated in leaning back and forward off the edge of the tower, sitting down and extending our arms while leaning back. We did have a great time!

After about 30 minutes, the sun was setting and as the tour came to an end, the picture opportunity arose. I had just taken my solo photo, and as David moved into the picture frame, he smiled, walked over and got down on one knee. "Sarah, you are the love of my life," he began to say.

"Are you serious?" I was stunned! I began to cry. "OMG, OMG," I kept happily saying over my tears of joy. I replied, "Yes," and then we kissed. "I'm getting married!" was all I could say. And there we were, on the top of the world, literally.

Now we are planning our special day coming up this summer. We can't wait!

How I proposed to your mother

Benjamin Hackman
Special to The CJN

When our children ask us one day, I'll tell them I first got the idea from the radio, from a forecast on the CBC announcing a series of constellations said to appear throughout the entire month of July, peaking on the 15th with a diamond: on the bottom of the diamond was Aldebaran, the brightest star of Taurus; to the right, Venus; on the top, Jupiter; and to the left, a crescent moon with earthshine.

About a half hour before dawn, the diamond could be seen clearly by the naked eye. Was it magnificent?

"That, I regret to say, I cannot tell you, children. I was not there, though I had planned to be. In fact, I'd planned to drag your mother out of bed into the streets early in the morning to kneel before her slippered feet and shout, 'I love you. Sarit - I do - will you marry me?' But it did not happen that way."

"Why not?" the children will ask.

"Because," I'll answer, "your [mother's] Bubbie Min passed away the night before, and it was her engagement ring I had planned to pop the question with."

Here is the story I will tell them.

For over a month, I had plotted and schemed, working up to the day when I would ask your mother to be my wife. My dreams had been burdened by anxieties of being caught with a secret. My nostrils were constantly itchy, as if I needed to sneeze, and I felt at times that mommy must surely know what I am plotting. "You're acting unlike yourself," I would imagine her saying.

"I'm fine, dear - honest," I would answer.

I was cracking up.

Up until that point, everything had gone according to plan: I'd called Zaide Brian and gotten his blessing, retrieved the ring from Bubbie Carole, arranged it with mommy to wake up early for the constellation, and memorized what I was going to say. I was ready - ready to pop the question, ready to wade through the waterworks, hug and kiss my new fiancé and wake up the whole neighbourhood with the wonderful news of our engagement. But then Great-Bubbie Min passed away.

A day was afforded to family who needed time to fly into Toronto for the funeral, and so it was on July 17 that mommy and I got up early, put on our funeral clothes and headed over to Bubbie Carole and Zaide Brian's to help prepare for the shivah.

"Have you asked her yet?" Zaide Brian asked, during a moment alone with me in the kitchen.

"I'm not sure what to do anymore," I said. And I didn't. Half the family was sitting shivah. How would they celebrate with us? And was it disrespectful to even consider such a thing at a time like this? Furthermore, mommy was upset. She missed her Bubbie Min. Did I really want to overburden her?

"You should ask the rabbi," said Zaide Brian. "Rabbi Diamond."

Of all the names in the world, I thought.

Soon, mommy and Bubbie Carole came back into the kitchen, and gradually the whole family arrived.

Somberly, we shuffled into limousines and headed to the funeral.

"My Great-Bubbie Min had the softest hands," mommy's eulogy began. She stood on her tippy toes behind a wooden podium and craned her neck in order to speak into the microphone. "I remember as a child marvelling at their softness, hoping that when I grew up my hands would be just as nice to hold."

It was a beautiful eulogy.

Later at the shivah, after the visitors thinned out, Bubbie Carole found me in the kitchen alone. "Have you asked her yet?"

"I'm not sure what to do," I said. "The family won't be able to celebrate, and I don't want to overburden Sarit."

Sarit and Benjamin

And maybe it's not respectful to Min to do it right now, and I just don't know what to do."

Here I'll turn to our wide-eyed children and ask, "Do you know what Bubbie Carole said to me next?"

She said, "I think Min died when she did because I gave you her engagement ring. I think she knew that she could rest, finally knowing that her granddaughter would be married."

Bubbie Carole's eyebrows rose optimistically, and a small, close-lipped smile appeared on her face as if to say, "Yes, I know, it's hard," and then, after a moment, she said, "It's up to you," and mommy came into the kitchen and asked if I was ready to leave.

When the two of us arrived back at the house, I asked your mother if she would take a walk with me, to clear our minds of all the death and the mourning and tears. We changed out of our funeral clothes and I stuffed the ring into my pocket without her seeing.

"Are you all right?" mommy asked as we walked along Bloor Street together. "You're acting kind of weird," she said.

"How about we go to the garden at Christie Pits," I suggested. "We can watch the sunset there and unwind."

"But are you all right?"

"Fine, Sarit. Honest. Just wound up from the day."

The sky was turning orange, and a thin grey cloud floated over us. I was worried it might rain.

We sat together on a log in the garden facing each other silently. To the east of us, children giggled, chasing one another in the playground on the other side of the park. Two high school boys smoked a cigarette on the other side of the fence outside the garden. I prayed to God your mother wouldn't notice the bulge from the ring box inside my pocket.

"It's a shame we didn't get to see the constellation," I said.

"I'm sorry, Ben. I feel awful. I know you wanted to see it," she said.

"Oh, it's not your fault," I said. A few feet away, a little black squirrel sniffed an early unripe squash, then turned and scampered away. "I haven't told you about the constellation yet, have I?"

"No. Tell me."

"It was apparently pretty amazing. On the bottom was Aldebaran, the brightest star of Taurus, to represent you, born in May; and on the right was Venus, the ruler of Libra, to represent me, born in October."

Surprise! Planning a post-proposal party

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

Planning a surprise engagement can be quite difficult for today's young Jewish couples, many of whom plan engagement celebrations called L'chaims before the proposal has even happened. But with enough creativity, it can be pulled off.

That's what Jordan Lass hoped to do when he proposed to his fiancée, Sara Gurza, a few weeks ago.

"I really wanted to surprise her and I knew that would be tough because she was expecting it," said Lass, a Ph.D. student in psychology at McMaster University. "The two keys things were making it meaningful and catching her off-guard."

He tried to keep the moment casual rather than create a fancy evening out where she might suspect what was going on. Instead, Lass insisted that Gurza wait to watch the season finale of one of their favourite shows together.

A few minutes into the season finale, the video switched to a pre-taped video of Lass, with "In My Life" by The Beatles playing in the background. He then got down on one knee and proposed.

"She was so surprised, which is somewhat surprising since she was asking about it almost every day before that," said Lass.

Jordan and Sara

"She kept asking if it was real and couldn't believe that our parents were already at her house getting a little party together." Their wedding is set for June 16, 2013.

Although they both went to the same high school, they first met at a mutual friend's house.

"We got along right away," said Gurza, 22. "I thought he was a really cool guy and was really down to earth. We became friends first but started dating shortly after."

Becoming friends first is also how Shoshana Gottfried met her fiancée, Reuben Morrow.

They met seven years ago since they had many friends in common. "He lived close to me so on Shabbat he would come by and pick me up and we would walk to another friend's house," said Gottfried, 25. "Eventually, we started to just sit and talk at my house instead of sticking to the original plans."

Even then, she said it took awhile for their friendship to turn into romance. "We were at a Hillel party around Purim time about two years ago, and I'm not sure what he said or did but I saw him differently and we thought we'd give it a try." Since then, they've been inseparable, and on Sept. 3, Morrow proposed.

They had already discussed getting engaged this summer, so when a photographer friend emailed her and a bunch of their friends to join him for a day of photos in the park, she got suspicious. "Reuben tried to psych me out of it and he told me 'I know we said this summer but I don't know if the timing is right,'" said Gottfried.

But little did she know that he had already staged an elaborate proposal.

When they arrived at Mill Pond Park, their friend pulled out a small table and two glasses of champagne. "Our photographer friend was taking a few shots of us, and then he asked me to turn my head away from Reuben so he could photograph me from an angle," said Gottfried. "When I turned around, Reuben was down on one knee, holding a ring and I started crying."

And out of all their friends and family, she was the last to know. "When I started making phone calls, I was shrieking but they all knew about it already," she said.

And after he proposed, they went back to her house for a L'chaim celebration – joining her family and friends who had already known about the surprise engagement for weeks.

Yardena Davis
Special to The CJN

It was a day like any other. I woke up mid-Sunday morning and had a delicious king-size breakfast with my family prepared by my father. A few days earlier, my sister had asked if I would like to go take some fall pictures with her. She is an amateur photographer and would often use me as a model to practice her skills. I agreed as my Sunday afternoon calendar was open and began getting things ready for our shoot after breakfast.

My boyfriend called me as I was getting ready to go, and wished me luck and a fun day out with my sister. Little did I know it would be the last time he would be my "boyfriend."

Out we went deep into the downtown core taking pictures as we went. First stop was the University of Toronto, where I studied for four years as an English literature major. Then we made our way into Kensington Market to get the real feeling of our city as can only be experienced in certain locations. Following that we made our way to the Distillery District, dashing between rain showers and puddles, reminding us that even a perfectly planned day can be disrupted by the weather.

The day was wearing on and we were both getting tired but my sister assured me the next stop on our picture taking tour would be our last. We hopped onto the ferry to the Toronto Island Airport as the view from the other side is spectacular. Off the ferry and walking eastward toward the city, I was so distracted by the view that I almost missed my future fiancée standing there waiting for me with a single red rose. As he approached, I quickly figured out their master plot and knew that the next few moments would be the most important in my life so far.

The sky had been threatening all day, but at that moment, it was perfect. He expressed himself beautifully and got down on one knee. There was a little red box, tears, and a resounding "yes"! Mazal tov!

The planets came together

But of course Libra and Taurus are both ruled by the planet Venus, the planet of love, beauty, art, romance and family. You can imagine how special I thought it was that both you and I would be represented together like that in the sky."

"Absolutely."

"Then on the left was a crescent moon with Earthshine. That means that although the moon was a crescent, the shadow of a full moon could be seen veiled over it because of sunlight reflecting off the Earth. Of course the moon is the ruler of Cancer, and our relationship, having begun in July is born in the month of Cancer, the ruler of deep emotion, the home, and motherhood."

At this point, your mother was beginning to put the pieces together.

"On the top," I continued, "was Jupiter, the largest of the planets, the father of the zodiac and the ruler of optimism and great fortune. All four elements came together in the sky for one brief period of time to form a diamond, Sarit, and I thought to myself, HaShem doesn't put diamonds in the sky for nothing."

At this point, your mother's eyes opened widely. She drew in a breath slowly and waited.

I took Great-Bubbie Min's ring out of my pocket and said, "Sarit, in the spirit of finding your Bubbie's hands in your own, will you be my wife?"

As predicted, mommy cried. She cried for so long I wasn't sure if the answer was yes or no, but eventually, she did say yes, and then yes again, and again, and again, and the sky turned an extraordinary pink, and the moon rose over the garden.

Couple received dual honorary degrees from U of T

Barbara Silverstein
Special to the CJN

On the winter break last December, Sheldon Inwentash and Lynn Factor were in Hong Kong travelling with their three children when Inwentash got an urgent message from David Naylor, president of the University of Toronto.

"He said, 'You can call me any time up until midnight our time,'" recalled Inwentash. "I got worried. I thought there must be a serious problem at the school."

When the two men finally spoke, Inwentash said he was "on top of the world" literally and figuratively. Just as the family reached the summit of Victoria Peak, the highest elevation in Hong Kong, they learned that U of T would be conferring honorary doctor of laws degrees (LLD) on Inwentash and Factor at the 2012 spring convocation.

"I was stunned," Inwentash said. "It was totally out of the blue."

U of T rarely awards dual honorary doctor of laws to couples or members of the same family. It's happened just six times in the past eight years, according to university records, and for Factor and Inwentash news of this honour was particularly sweet, because it had come just weeks before they were to celebrate their 25th wedding anniversary.

The couple met on a blind date, a fix-up by friends. "We connected right away," recounted Factor. At the time, she was a social-work supervisor working full-time at the Durham Children's Aid Society (CAS) and Inwentash, was vice-president of high-risk investments at a life insurance company.

Today, he's a venture capitalist and the chairman and CEO of Pinetree Capital, while Factor does front-line work part time, preparing vulnerable and at-risk children for court hearings. She is also heavily involved with a variety of volunteer committees geared to child welfare.

Inwentash and Factor are major supporters of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, but have made their more public philanthropic mark in social welfare.

Inwentash said he was at the "pivotal point" in his career in 2007 to give back to the community and so he and Factor decided to donate money to U of T, his alma mater. He has a bachelor of commerce degree in accounting and economics from the institution.

The couple's donation of $15 million was unusual because it was directed to the faculty of social work, now named the Factor-Inwentash School of Social Work.

Inwentash called the donation "supporting the underdog" because schools of social work, unlike medical and business schools, rarely get substantial gifts. "It was a collaboration between Lynn and myself..."

"It was a way to support the work that Lynn is doing. It's her life's work. She is still a front-line social worker... She is in touch with reality."

Indeed, Factor has a lengthy involvement with child welfare professionally and as a volunteer. She graduated from Ryerson University School of Social Work and went on to get her master's degree at York University, studying part time, while she supervised a child protection team in Durham Region.

Community service keeps marriage strong

She worked in Durham for 17 years, and for much of that time, she juggled full-time work with raising a young family.

She described that period as a busy time for her and Inwentash as they divided up parental responsibilities. Their children, Nicole, Raquel and Jakson, are now young adults.

When a part-time job at the Superior Court on University Avenue in Toronto became available, Factor worked in the victim witness-support program. "The court called me to cover a 'mat' leave. It was very hard to leave child welfare work. I still love child welfare work."

And she has continued her work in child welfare as a volunteer. Today, she is vice-chair of the Children's Aid Foundation, where she heads the scholarship committee for youth, current or former crown wards of the CAS applying for post-secondary education. Next year, she will be chair of the foundation.

Factor also sits on the dean's advisory council in the faculty of community services at Ryerson University, as well as the education committee of the Art Gallery of Ontario.

She said the arts can be used as a healing tool. "It's a viable option for helping children deal with personal issues."

Factor wears two hats at Boost, a child-abuse prevention and intervention centre. She works there part time, preparing children for court but also volunteers on the fundraising committee.

She and Inwentash, along with the Law Society of Ontario, funded a court kit used by Boost to help prepare children to testify in criminal court.

The couple is on the President's Committee at Wheaton College, a small liberal arts college south of Boston, where their daughter, Raquel, is a fourth-year student.

Factor also finds time to serve on the dean's advisory circle at the school of social work at U of T.

She said she was as surprised as her husband when she learned they were to be recipients of the honorary doctor of laws degrees from U of T. "I was in shock."

However, this was not the first time. Factor received an unexpected honour. In 2011, she was made a member of the prestigious Order of Ontario for her advocacy for vulnerable children and youth, and for developing a set of best practices for dealing with child victims of sexual abuse.

As Factor tells it, in the fall of 2010 her caller ID indicated there was a message from the Government of Ontario. At the time, she had no idea the call was about the Order of Ontario.

In fact, she said that when she saw the government ID, she thought she was in trouble. "I said, 'Why is the government calling me? It must be for all my unpaid parking tickets in front of Starbucks.'"

"I thought I'd call them back and say, 'Tell me how much I owe and I'll just write a cheque.'"

Needless to say, she was pretty surprised to learn she was being honoured by the government. "That was pretty unbelievable," she said, laughing. "I was ecstatic."

Honeymoon destinations: Bahamas, Grenada, Australian Outback

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

A honeymoon is a time of celebration, passion and romance, a fleeting period of focused tenderness that all too soon takes a back seat to the rush of daily life. Given the brevity of this exhilarating experience, a honeymoon is the one time in your life when you need no excuse to splash out by indulging in an exotic getaway. The further away that destination is from normal life – both in distance and in substance – the better.

Paradise Found

The Bahamas is a magnificent country of islands, where the sea is the turquoise blue of postcards and the climate is invigoratingly warm.

Paradise Island is home to Atlantis, a resort that captures the imagination with its vivid recreation of a Greek civilization rumoured to be lost beneath the ocean many centuries ago.

The resort's architecture is imposing, with Corinthian pillars, domed ceilings and spectacular murals adorning the walls. There's an underwater excavation site filled with tropical fish and a Mayan temple that doubles as a water slide, taking swimmers on a slippery route that passes through a shark pool.

When darkness falls, the resort's lagoons and aquariums are illuminated by underwater lights, and the pathways offer secluded nooks perfect for cuddling by moonlight. But there's another side to Atlantis, too, one with all the glitz and bustle of Las Vegas. The resort boasts the Caribbean's largest casino for those who feel lucky, surrounded by fashionable stores, a dance club and a wide variety of restaurants including steakhouses, delis and poolside fast food.

Spice Island

If you're more of an off-the-beaten track kinda couple, consider a honeymoon in Grenada, known to the world as the Isle of Spice. The Spice Island Beach Resort on the island's Grand Anse Beach is a picture-perfect manifestation of Caribbean serenity: cool tiled floors, dark wood furniture, breezy open spaces and a scent of flowers that perfumes the air.

Our room was massive, the size of a small townhouse, with two bathrooms, a living room, a bedroom with a massive four-poster bed surrounded by soft silky curtains and two dining tables – one indoors and one on the patio. Night life at this resort means a sumptuous buffet dinner to the sounds of a live steel band as guests dine on exotic food that carries the distinct tang of the Caribbean.

If you can tear yourself away from the resort, there's lots to do in Grenada. We joined Grenada Seafaris to check out an underwater art gallery in a nearby bay. To see it, we donned snorkels and plopped off the side of a speedboat into choppy waters. Thirty feet below, British sculptor Jason de Caires Taylor's underwater sculpture park contains 55 life-size sculptures that form a canvas through which he explores Caribbean folklore and attracts corals and fish to the reef.

Later that night we trekked across a beach on the northernmost tip of the island to listen to the soft snorting sound of a leatherback turtle as she laid her eggs. Within 15 minutes, there were 123 eggs in her nest, and after she covered and camouflaged them, she re-entered the surf and was quickly swallowed by the water.

Outback Wilderness

Unless you've travelled extensively in Australia, chances are you've never heard of the Daintree Wilderness in Queensland, a rainforest that has remained virtually untouched since the beginning of time. To explore it, we drove 2-1/2 hours from Cairns, crossed the crocodile-infested Daintree River and checked into the Cockatoo Hill Retreat. The series of four thatched cottages are obscured from view by the foliage that rises and rustles around it: banana palms, heliconia, bougainvillea and frangipani. There's no television here and only one telephone in the main lodge, which means that once dinner is over, guests retire to their cottages to take in the sounds of the wilderness night.

A guided hike through the rainforest is a memorable way to spend a day, and on ours we saw massive golden orb spiders, 1,000-year-old fan palms and a "spirit tree" with an ominous face carved into its trunk by aboriginals, marking the forest as a sacred place.

Enjoy the beach on the Bahamas

We also learned of the bush pig, a non-indigenous animal that is wreaking havoc by digging up the ancient roots of the forest as it searches for food. There are more than 10,000 bush pigs in the region, and they trot through the land on their destructive path unfazed by their spectators. One such pig met an unfortunate end in the currents of the Daintree River. While swimming from one bank to the other, he was met in the middle by a hungry crocodile. The rest, as they say, is history.

After the wedding date is set in Israel

Sybil Kaplan
Special to The CJN

When we attended our first Israeli wedding, we understood that many traditional ideas and customs about weddings are different in Israel from what we were used to. The same is true for brides.

When Jerusalem-born Orli Zedek grew up, her mother had a beauty salon and was a dressmaker.

"From the age of four, I slept under wedding gowns, and I wasn't allowed to touch them!" the 37-year-old mother of four exclaimed, sitting in her bridal shop in Jerusalem.

The fantasy that she could touch the gowns remained, and after she completed the army and was ready to get married, she made her own wedding gown.

When she was 28, her father died and she realized that "I was already grown up. I decided to take my profession and start a career."

First she started to do hairdressing as a main profession. Then brides came and asked her to do their hair and makeup for their weddings, although they were buying their wedding dresses elsewhere.

Eight years ago, Zedek started to design wedding dresses on order, working from her house.

"Suddenly I realized I enjoyed this very much. My husband bought me a sewing machine and I enrolled at Shenkar College of Engineering Design and Art, where fashion design is taught."

After a semester, she realized she had more experience than the other students, and she left. Since she was living in a Jewish community in the West Bank, brides found it hard to get to Zedek, so two years ago May, she opened her own shop.

Brides come to her because she sees the whole concept and has different taste and different styles.

The real competition is from Tel Aviv because brides often don't know that there are as many as 30 such bridal shops in Jerusalem.

Approximately 40 per cent of Zedek's clients are secular, 30 per cent are religious and 30 per cent are Arab.

A "package" includes gown, hair, nails and makeup and ranges from 6,000-12,000 NIS ($1,595-$3,191). Prices vary according to whether the gown is used, ready-made or new; whether the design is simple or complicated, and the type of material used.

For the entire package, a client usually comes to Zedek three months before the wedding. Zedek then tries to determine what style of gown the bride wants and takes her measurements. If the bride wants an original design, Zedek starts to make sketches.

From start to finish, the bride may come between two and six times. In between Zedek does potential styling of her hair and makeup.

Orli Zedek with a favourite gown
(Barry A. Kaplan/Jerusalem photos)

On the wedding day, the bride is welcomed with music and some food. First her nails are done, then she is served breakfast. Hair styling is next and can take one to three hours. This is followed by makeup.

When the bride gets dressed, a photographer comes, and then the groom comes. They then go by car to wherever they want more photos taken before returning to the shop for makeup and hair touch-ups. Only then do they drive to the place where the wedding will be held. Zedek has designed six collections since 2005. She said she gets her ideas "from emotions. Every collection has a different influence from a different source."

Her first collection was the "childhood" collection, and the gowns were based on those of fairy tale heroines like Cinderella and Snow White. Another collection was based on sexy women of films from the '30s and '40s.

As we walk into a dressing room where a rack holds a large collection of ready-made gowns, Zedek says, "Every gown is my pride for the moment. Every time I make a dress, I fall in love with it!"

Orli Zedek is located at 51 Derech Hebron in Jerusalem, 02 650 6512 and has a website - agass.mitchatnim.co.il.

Artist marks his work with pomegranate motif

Sybil Kaplan
Special to The CJN

Go into any gift shop in Jerusalem and the pomegranate design is there on hamsas, jewelry boxes, salt and pepper shakers, matchbox covers, keychains, evening bags, wall hangings, varied embroidered items, and myriad religious items. They are the distinguishable mark of an Israeli artist.

In the Talpiot neighborhood of Jerusalem, in an alley off Yad Harutzim 6, at the end, and up some stairs through a blue painted door is the showroom, storage area, workshop and office of Yair Emanuel.

The rather shy, ordinary Israeli man in his 40s is wearing slacks and a long-sleeve collarless shirt. Despite his subdued appearance, his work has made him rather popular.

"I don't want to think who is buying and where are my things," he said. "If I think about it, I will feel too proud of myself."

And so one gets an immediate impression of a very talented, humble man.

He describes his style as "a combination of all the new, mostly Judaica which is old, but I make it new and happy, not heavy, like silver. It doesn't look serious," he says.

He does the graphics by hand on paper, and then he scans them onto the computer where he does the measurements. After that, he makes the actual item.

Emanuel's signature pomegranate motif on a dish

"First we paint the wood with white for background, then I draw an outline on the white, then I paint inside the lines. Finally, we put on varnish," he said.

The embroidery is one of three types. "One is hand embroidery on painted cloth. Another is computer embroidery. The third is applique where we cut out the shape then embroider the patches."

One of the ways someone could recognize an Emanuel work is through the pomegranates.

"It's a very nice fruit, we bless it on Rosh Hashanah, and it has a very interesting shape, like a crown on top. I also like the color."

In addition to the wood and embroidered items, Emanuel has begun a new style with coloured metal in wine cups, trivets and hand-washing cups in deep shades of burgundy, silver, gold, wine and deep blue. He describes it as sand-cast aluminum.

Emanuel was born into an Orthodox family 48 years ago in the religious communal settlement Kibbutz Sha'alavim, 24 kilometres from Jerusalem.

"I had a connection to Judaica from my family," he says.

He studied art at the Bezalel Academy of Arts and Design when it was located behind the central bus station in Jerusalem. He later taught art in Mitzpe Ramon, a town 160 kilometres south of Jerusalem. Then he started to create art to sell. In 1990, he made silk paintings by hand.

"Then I started with other fabrics and embroidery. I like to make new things."

In 2004, he saw that the southern neighborhood of Talpiot was "empty and cheap," so he opened his factory and showroom there. He sells his items from his showroom for 25 per cent less than in town. He ships orders as well, and payment depends on the number of works purchased.

He has a wife and two children, aged 17 and 19. The 17-year-old son is following in his father's artistic footsteps through studying art in a special high school.

In the future, Emanuel sees himself continuing as he is. "Every week I make two to four new designs. I like what I am doing and I like to make new things."

A visit to his show room is a delightful experience and one always finds warm, welcoming, helpful staff and items beautifully displayed.

Peres urges Iranians to topple regime

Asher Zieger and Times of Israel Staff
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — President Shimon Peres said last week that the people of Iran should be encouraged to overthrow their government.

Following a visit to a high school in the northern Druze village of Yarka, the president told reporters that "sanctions are beginning to work and to make a difference."

"We must support the Iranian people... I believe we would all be happy to bring the Iranian government down from its high and dangerous branch," he said.

Referring to the pro-Iranian Hezbollah's launch of a drone into Israel almost two weeks ago, Peres said the terror group was more of a threat to Lebanon than to Israel.

Kotel rabbi offers blessings to Canada

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The current rabbi of the Western Wall offered his blessings to Canada and its Jewish community during a visit to Toronto's Sephardic Kehila Centre on Oct. 18.

Rabbi Shmuel Rabinowitz told The CJN via a translator that he'd come to Canada to meet with the Jewish community and encourage everyone to visit the Kotel (the Western Wall) to strengthen their Jewish identity.

He was also scheduled to visit New York City and Miami after his three-day Toronto visit.

"I came to Canada to visit with the community and meet with those who have visited the Kotel. Many [Canadian] Jews visit, but it's not enough. Every Jewish child should have their bar mitzvah at the wall," he said.

Rabbi Shmuel Rabinowitz

"It's the place that connects us to our past. It gives us the power for the future. And there's no better place to be connected to the changing of the generations, which is the meaning of the bar mitzvah day."

Rabbi Rabinowitz also noted the intense bond that's been forged between Israel, the Kotel and Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird, who visited the Western Wall in August and met with him while there.

The rabbi said Baird told him jokingly, "I'm the second-most Zionist foreign minister in the world. The first is [Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor] Lieberman. But there's not that big a gap between No.1 and No. 2."

Rabbi Rabinowitz said he responded to Baird that he knew that Canada is not in a bad position economically relative to the rest of the world.

"I believe that one of the things that helped insulate Canada from [the global recession] was due to its support for Israel," he said.

Asked if he had any other message for Canada's Jewish community, Rabbi Rabinowitz said that in order to preserve their Jewish identity, today's Jews must know how to create the next generation of Jews.

Portus Leniency Plea

TORONTO — Michael Mendelson, ex-CEO of collapsed hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management, asked the Ontario Securities Commission (OSC) last week not to make him pay back $320,000 in ill-gotten gains because he doesn't have the money. Mendelson said he has "a willingness to pay" but can't, the Toronto Star reported. He and partner Boaz Manor started Portus in 2003 and amassed 26,000 clients and $800 million in assets. Just before it collapsed in 2005, after regulators flagged its record-keeping and investments, Mendelson authorized $320,000 in payments to himself. Manor, who is serving a four-year jail term, bought diamonds with $8.8 million in Portus funds that haven't been recovered.

Ex-Shul To Be Razed

CALGARY — A building that once housed Calgary's largest shul is slated to be torn down for a condo project. The former Shaarey Tzedec Synagogue, which hasn't been used as a shul since 1986, when a merger with Beth Israel Synagogue formed Beth Tzedec Congregation, was built in 1959 to serve 900 families. It had been added to a city list of historic buildings for its modernist architecture, but not protected from demolition, the Calgary Herald reported. One ex-member wants the city to turn the building, which sold last May for $4.2 million, into an arts venue.

Hezbollah Removed

JERUSALEM — Facebook took down pages for Hezbollah, its affiliated Al-Manar TV station and its leader, Hassan Nasrallah. It's the second time the social networking site has removed pages for the Lebanese group. The first was in August, but it created new ones. The Middle East Media Research Institute alerted Facebook to the pages both times.

Canadian Released From IDF Jail

JERUSALEM — Canadian Yana Gorelik was freed from an Israeli military jail last week after serving only half of her three-month sentence for draft-dodging.

Gorelik, 30, a dual Israeli-Canadian citizen whom Israel said dodged its army draft, was granted clemency by Maj.-Gen. Orna Barbivay, head of the IDF's personnel directorate and Israel's first female major general.

Gorelik moved to Toronto with her family when she was 17. The massage therapist was detained at Ben-Gurion Airport over the Labour Day weekend when she arrived from London, where she now lives with her fiancé, for a cousin's wedding. The IDF claimed she never made arrangements to be exempted from the draft, but her family has said she had been back to Israel several times over the years. After reaching a plea deal, she was sentenced Sept. 27 to three months in jail. She later wrote a letter to Barbivay saying she didn't intend to break the law and asked to be forgiven, the Toronto Star reported.

An argument reportedly erupted Oct. 17 between Barbivay and IDF Military Advocate Brig.-Gen. Danny Efroni at a charity basketball game, with Efroni questioning Barbivay's move. "I know that the message is wrong, but she did sit [in jail] for 45 days," she said.

Heirs Rebuffed

LOS ANGELES — The heirs of Superman's co-creator, Toronto-born Joe Shuster, can't reclaim copyrights to the popular character, a U.S. judge ruled Oct. 17. The ruling gives DC Comics, owned by Warner Bros., all rights to Superman for books, movies, TV and other media. In response to a DC lawsuit filed in 2010 seeking confirmation it owns all copyrights, the judge said Schuster's sister and her son didn't succeed in reclaiming their rights to Superman. His ruling cited a 1992 deal she made to get annual payments from DC in exchange for all rights to the character. The estate of co-creator Jerry Siegel reclaimed some rights about four years ago.

Community bids farewell to McGuinty

Premier Dalton McGuinty with Israeli President Shimon Peres in 2010

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Jewish leaders offered both praise and criticism for Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty after he announced his resignation last week.

McGuinty, who will step down once a new leader is chosen at the Ontario Liberal party's leadership convention on Jan. 25, had many dealings with the community during his nine years in office.

Many community leaders chose to laud the premier for his work with various organizations and for fostering increased trade with Israel, while others could not forgive his refusal to provide funding to faith-based schools in the province.

Elizabeth Wolfe, chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, extended "good wishes" to the premier on his future endeavours.

"We commend the premier for his long-standing commitment to public life, his concern for the vulnerable and his unwavering respect for human rights in a vibrant, richly diverse and remarkably multicultural Ontario," Wolfe said in a statement.

"Although we disagreed with Premier McGuinty on the importance of public financial support for all faith-based schools, we always appreciated [his] positive relationship with the Jewish community and noted his enthusiasm for Israel, exemplified by his successful visit in 2010."

The McGuinty-led economic mission to Israel that year has since resulted in new collaborations in science and technology research between the province and the Jewish state.

Bernie Farber, former CEO of now-defunct Canadian Jewish Congress from 2005 to 2011 and the Liberal candidate for Thornhill in last year's provincial election, said he and McGuinty shared a long history, going back to their shared roots in Ottawa, and called the premier a strong supporter on "almost everything" of Jewish interest.

We're here to help.

In the realm of dirty tricks, it was quite nasty.

As Jews in America were celebrating the last days of the Sukkot festival earlier this month, 15 prominent American Protestant leaders sent a letter to the U.S. Congress urging the legislators to investigate Israel's adherence to bilateral agreements with a view to possibly suspending U.S. aid to Israel.

Adding to the betrayal was the fact that these very same Protestant leaders were slated to meet two weeks later, on Oct. 22 and 23, with leaders of the Jewish community for their annual Christian-Jewish roundtable dialogue.

Leaders of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, the United Methodist Church, the U.S. National Council of Churches and the United Church of Christ signed the letter. It was sent to every member of Congress.

To be sure, the timing of the initiative was profoundly insensitive. But it was the nature of the request to the congressmen and congresswomen that was the real stinging saline drip into the open gash of interfaith relations.

As the letter makes clear, the Protestant leaders are advocating a policy that carries with it the possibility of actual jeopardy to Israel's security. As reported by JTA, the signatories allege that "unconditional U.S. military assistance to Israel has contributed to sustaining the [Israeli-Palestinian] conflict and undermining the long-term security interests of both Israelis and Palestinians."

The signatories asked Congress to launch "an immediate investigation into possible violations by Israel" of agreements with Washington for alleged illegal use of U.S.-sold weapons against Palestinians. They also asked for "regular reporting on compliance and the withholding of military aid for non-compliance."

This is not merely a ploy to tarnish Israel's public image or, conversely, to burnish that of the Palestinians. This is a high-level attempt at influencing public policy on the eve of the presidential elections, the purpose of which is ultimately to strike down the $3 billion that Israel annually receives from the United States.

The potential for harm to the Jewish state is quite real.

The clerics' ploy is sinister and deeply troubling.

Not surprisingly, and indeed quite appropriately, the Jewish leaders decided to cancel their participation in this year's roundtable meeting.

As reported by JTA, the Jewish groups involved – the American Jewish Committee, B'nai Brith International, the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly, the Union for Reform Judaism and the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism – told the church leaders that their letter to Congress "represents an escalation in activity that the Jewish participants feel precludes a business-as-usual approach."

Ethan Felson, vice-president and general counsel of the umbrella group, the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, described the Protestant leaders' plea to Congress as "a betrayal of trust."

Canadians are not strangers to this very same sense of betrayal of bona fide interfaith dialogue and of fair-minded, honest, reasonable judgment of Israel in its conflict with the Palestinians.

Betrayal of trust

The lack of fair-minded judgment of Israel was quite dishearteningly on display at the convocation in August of the General Council of the United Church of Canada.

At a recent panel discussion at Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto on "Boycotts, the United Church and the future of interfaith dialogue" (see story in this edition of The CJN) Rabbi Jarrod Grover described the letter to Congress as part of "an effort to delegitimize Israel and target aid to Israel, which is really taking root in Liberal Protestant churches."

But if interfaith communications here and in the United States are to be suspended, temporarily at least, at the national and organizational level, it is neither feasible nor desirable to sever such discussions and relations at the local and individual level. Moreover, the picture is far different for ordinary folk who live and travel in the field of personal interfaith friendships than it is for the ecumenical leaders who dwell on top of the hill, so to speak.

According to Rabbi Noam Marans, director of inter-religious and intergroup relations for the American Jewish Committee, "The overwhelming majority of American Christians understand that Israel must defend itself and that Israel is not an aggressor, that Israel is on the front lines of terrorism."

Even if Rabbi Marans' observation is correct, it does not abate the worrisome trend unfolding among certain church leaders.

In Rabbi Grover's words: "We've got a real serious problem."

Holocaust Education Week offers variety of programs

Compiled by CJN Staff

The 32nd annual Holocaust Education Week, running from Nov. 1 to Nov. 8, is exploring the theme of Culture of Memory.

Sponsored by the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, this year's education week will feature programs that explore how memory of the Holocaust is shaped by artistic, national and scholarly perspectives, said Mira Goldfarb, executive director of the centre.

"We've taken a new direction by placing an emphasis on artistic and literary representations of the Holocaust spanning across generations and nationalities."

She said reflecting upon the Culture of Memory invites new audiences and new generations to engage in a subject that is universal and continues to be relevant in today's world.

"The programs are diverse and compelling, offering multiple points of entry and dialogue," she said.

Holocaust Education Week includes more than 100 different programs, including exhibits, panel discussions, cultural performances, lectures, film screenings and survivor testimonies.

The week is opening at the Royal Ontario Museum with author Nathan Englander, who was selected by the New Yorker as one of the "20 Writers of the 21st Century." His short story collection, What We Talk About When We Talk About Anne Frank, explores Jewish identity in the contemporary world and the perpetual shadow of the Holocaust.

The closing program, "Reclaiming Memory," on Nov. 8 at Beth Tzedec Congregation, features a concert by ARC (Artists of the Royal Conservatory).

Closing night also includes a commemorative program on the 74th anniversary of Kristallnacht with a candlelighting ceremony and the participation of Canadian War Veterans in honour of Remembrance Day.

Other programs include conversations with Holocaust survivors, held throughout the week in a variety of locations, and a lecture on Nov. 3 at Shaar Shalom Synagogue on "Addressing Austria's Past: Responsibility, Remembrance and Restitution," featuring Hannah Lessing, secretary general of the national fund of the Republic of Austria and head of the Austrian delegation at the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research.

Israel should investigate

Seeing women wear prayer shawls, pray and read from the Torah collectively is no longer an unusual sight in the Jewish world outside of Israel. Even in the Orthodox world, an increasing number of "modern Orthodox" congregations are finding ways to accommodate the religious stirrings of the women in their midst. In Israel, however, the sight is rare indeed, because the religious establishment in Israel is under the control of, essentially, one approach to Jewish observance, namely, the haredi way.

That is why in 1988, a group of women came together to form Women of the Wall. Their central mission was then and remains today to achieve in Israel what is becoming more commonplace throughout the rest of the Jewish world: the right "to wear prayer shawls, pray and read from the Torah collectively and out loud at the Western Wall." They assemble at the Wall each Rosh Chodesh to do so.

On June 4, 2003, Israel's Supreme Court confirmed that the group had a legal right to pray at the Western Wall. The government was required to designate a special place for such prayer at Robinson's Arch, near the southernmost point of the Wall. The group's right however did not allow causing offence to other worshippers. This was interpreted to mean praying without wearing tallit or a tallit, as that would surely cause offence to some of the men – and, it must also be added, to some of the women as well – ostensibly in the midst of their own prayers somewhere else at the Wall. Last week, on Rosh Chodesh, Anat Hoffman, the executive director of Women of the Wall, was arrested while leading prayer services at the wall "for disturbing public order," i.e., for wearing a tallit and raising her voice high in prayer. Hoffman alleges that her treatment in custody included a naked strip search and being "dragged on the floor 15 metres."

Setting aside for the moment the issue of the women's right to collective prayer, including wearing the tallit, if Hoffman's allegations are true, there can be no justification whatsoever for such outrageous and abusive treatment by the police.

One cannot complain of Women of the Wall that their purpose of changing the "religious" status quo at the Wall is overtly political and not really religious. For it is indeed the political system that vests such complete authority in the hands of a group that is utterly inimical to other, different ways of expressing Jewish ritual.

The penultimate paragraph of Israel's Declaration of Independence is an "appeal to the Jewish people throughout the Diaspora to rally round the Jews of Eretz Israel in the tasks of immigration and up-building."

Having summoned the Jews of the world – presumably in all our wide diversity – to Eretz Israel, how can Israel – some 65 years later – still refuse to accommodate the legitimate, sincere, and deeply held religious diversity of the Jews to whom the country directed that appeal?

Reform Jewry's leaders in the United States have called for an investigation into the police's treatment of Hoffman. We support that call.

25 years ago in The CJN

Economist Robert Solow, an American Jew, won the Nobel Prize in economics for developing a model showing long-term growth depends on technological progress, not just labour and capital, while Soviet born Jewish poet Joseph Brodsky won the Nobel Prize for literature.

Exhibit incites hatred against Jews, Israel

The downtown Hamilton Public Library recently featured drawings, at the library's main entrance, that were purported to be children's drawings illustrating how Palestinian children suffered during Israeli military operations in 2009 ("Hamilton library display sparks discord," Oct. 11). The Hamilton Jewish Federation's public affairs committee protested the display on the grounds that it incited hatred against Israel and Jews. The library agreed to move the display to the fourth floor, but many people saw the exhibit before it was moved. The public affairs committee should have pressed for an investigation to find out who approved the exhibit's installation in the library and if the library investigated to determine if the display was fraudulent, written to the Hamilton Spectator to state the Jewish case against this exhibit, and lobbied elected officials who oversee the library to represent the Jewish community's point of view, as well as demanding an apology from the library for using a tax-supported building to promote anti-Jewish propaganda. In short, federation and its committee were remiss in not doing more to combat this odious display whose main objective was to incite hatred.

Community's support of PM

Kudos to columnist Jean M. Gerber for raising an issue in your newspaper that I have not seen discussed, namely much of the Jewish community's blind allegiance to the Conservative party simply because Prime Minister Stephen Harper is pro-Israel ("Put not your trust in princes," Oct. 11). I agree that it is wonderful to finally have a prime minister who forthrightly supports Israel and denounces Israel's enemies. However, there are many other policies promulgated by the Tories, for example, in the areas of finance, environment, science, women's rights, foreign aid, crime prevention, electioneering and openness to public scrutiny, where their practices are debatable, to say the least. I would like to see the Jewish electorate think seriously about all the issues when deciding which party to support, instead of acting in a knee-jerk reflexive manner based on one area only, even though it is very important.

Michael Kinrys

Jean M. Gerber in "Put not your trust in princes" (Oct. 11) raises issues that are of importance to Israel and in the fight against antisemitism. She criticizes Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who are both on the political right. Netanyahu is criticized for meddling in the U.S. political campaign by asking for help in curbing Iran's march to nuclear capability. Certainly, with Israel facing an existential threat, any Israeli prime minister should leave no stone unturned to ensure that another holocaust is prevented. Harper's views on Israel, antisemitism and actions on Iran are viewed with suspect by the political left. They don't believe that a great leader who says and does things because it is just and moral to do so may emerge from the right. Harper's critics cynically believe his speaking out in defence of Israel and against antisemitism is political pandering to Jews. Issues such as health care, poverty, research and immigration should not preclude offering support to a leader who is at the forefront of Israel's battle for survival.

Prison chaplains

Here is a link to a petition created by Cantor Michael Zoosman to the federal government to reinstate funding for minority chaplains, including Jewish chaplains, in Canadian penitentiaries ("Ottawa defends cuts to part-time chaplains," Oct. 18). If you agree with it, please sign the petition at www.change.org. The Conservative federal government of Canada, normally friendly to minorities, including Jews, and to Israel, has decided to save a few farthings by eliminating the funding of part-time chaplains in the Canadian prison system. This would include Jewish chaplains. Public Safety Minister Vic Toews, has said that volunteers or Christian chaplains would serve the purpose. Zoosman is a young American cantor who served recently at the Conservative Congregation Beth Israel in Vancouver and as a chaplain in the prison system. He has returned to the United States to study more about being a chaplain. He is an involved, concerned and compassionate man, and a friend of mine.

Greek neo-Nazi party rises as economy sinks

Maxine Dove

Tens of thousands of Greek protesters welcomed German Chancellor Angela Merkel to their country Oct. 9 with Nazi uniforms. Hitler salutes and swastika flags, lamenting the new European Union austerity measures that they attribute to her.

While protesters' gestures were symbolic, the real threat Nazi ideology poses to Greece comes from within.

Chrysi Avgi (Golden Dawn), the Greek neo-Nazi political party, denies the Holocaust. No one, however, can deny the increasing visibility, strength and political prowess the extreme right-wing movement is gaining as the economic crisis in Greece deepens. The fascist group has secured 18 seats – nine per cent of the total – in the Greek parliament and appears to be increasing its presence throughout the country.

Golden Dawn is replete with neo-Nazi signs and symbols, including the swastika banners and insignia-embazoned black shirts. Its platform denies the Holocaust and supports a nationalistic "Greece for Greeks" stand. Its voice is strident against both Jews and the approximately two million Pakistani, Indian, Albanian and African immigrants living in Greece.

The party promotes the belief that the immigrants have caused the country's massive unemployment and that Jews are responsible for the overall economic catastrophe in Europe. It has found favour among the economically bereft Greeks, offering social services and sustenance – in a style similar to Hamas – and providing "protection" the police can no longer offer. The group assists "pure" Greeks.

Dimitris Filippides, program director of the Greek-American "Hellas FM" Internet radio station in Greece, told JNS.

org that the rise of Golden Dawn and other far-right groups "is largely a phenomenon of the European financial crisis."

"These extreme right groups are traditionally connected with antisemitism, and, almost universally, denying the Holocaust is a principle of the far right," he said. Far-right extremists have carried out attacks against Jewish cemeteries in Greece, and the Golden Dawn is suspected of having defaced the country's Holocaust Memorial.

"Right now, the main concern is for the immigrants from Pakistan," Filippides said. "But, in principle, attacks against the Jewish community are possible... Unfortunately, about 19 per cent of Greeks are following [Golden Dawn's] theories of hatred. It can become dangerous – especially because of the economic situation."

"Whenever I say something against Golden Dawn on my radio program, I get many calls," he said. "If they are not stopped, I think it is just a matter of time until they get power in the community."

Filippides said many Greek Americans share the belief that the country's problems have been caused by foreigners and Jews – albeit not the tiny Jewish community remaining in Greece, but rather perceived Jewish control and financial maneuverings of firms such as Goldman Sachs and other "Jewish firms."

"They still believe Jews have the power to create economic instability," he said.

The reality of the financial misfortune is that it came from "mistakes made by the [European Union] and the Greeks themselves," Filippides said. "Everything is a matter of education and talking to the young people about reality," he said. "We should know things how they are... It is important to emphasize that the Jewish population is not responsible... We should not look for scapegoats – that's not the problem. The problem starts from ourselves. We need to reorient our culture."

Filippides said one influence that can impede the Golden Dawn is the enhanced diplomatic relationship between Greece and Israel. In the last several years, the political position of the Greek government has become more pro-Israel.

"People realized that the pro-Palestinian policy of the previous government did not bring any good result for the Greek people," he said. "We stood by the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] and [former Palestinian Authority president Yassar] Arafat and nothing was done in favour of the Greeks. Many people are happy to see a strong alliance between Greece and Israel, especially in consideration of the development of the recently discovered – and extensive – natural gas resources."

"The majority of the population realizes that we have things to gain from friendship with Israel," he added.

Many Greek officials say it is outrageous that the Golden Dawn has been elected. Nicos Papakostadanous, head of the press office of the Greek Consulate in New York, noted that they "are like any other party making inroads in Europe."

"The far right is making inroads in Greece because of the crisis and a social fabric that is terribly tried in a very severe way... These are hard times, similar to when Hitler took advantage to organize the German people in pogroms against the Jewish people – only the beginning," he told JNS.org. "This Golden Dawn is a backlash, a byproduct of very austere, very severe economic problems."

Asher Matathias, a Greek-born American Jew, university professor and activist within the Greek-American community, told JNS.org that the Golden Dawn comes complete with a fuhrer (leader Nikos Michaloliakos), a Heil Hitler salute, a symbol that reflects the swastika, and a paramilitary force, although they are wearing black, rather than brown shirts.

Matathias, however, does not consider Greek antisemitism "a hopeless condition." He noted that Filippides has "mandated that all Hellas FM producers sign a solemn agreement to abjure all racist and antisemitic content."

On Oct. 1, Golden Dawn party member and parliamentarian Eleni Zaroulia was appointed as a member of the committee on equality and non-discrimination of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) has "condemned the presence of a representative of the Greek neo-Nazi party Golden Dawn" on the committee, calling it "an affront to concepts of equality and non-discrimination."

ADL notes that Golden Dawn's Nazi-like principles demanding that "only men and women of Greek descent and consciousness" have full political rights "stands in the most stark contrast imaginable to the goals of the committee on equality and non-discrimination."

Matathias believes that the Golden Dawn hopes to "send the Greek government into paralysis to prove that only it can run a government." He points to the actions of Golden Dawn member of parliament Ilias Katsiariadis, who achieved national notoriety when, on live television, he attacked two other members of the Greek parliament.

"They are the scourge of Greek society," Matathias said of Golden Dawn members. "Decent people must prevent our native land from reaching the cliff of irrational and immoral lashing out against the vulnerable populations that inhabit it."

Harper's foreign policy is truly Canadian

Prime Minister Stephen Harper has done it again. By confronting Iran, he has championed Canadian values, and democracy. It's ironic that one of the criticisms of his assertive, affirmative foreign policy is that it is somehow "not Canadian." Fighting evil and refusing to maintain business as usual, even to the point of withdrawing your diplomats, marks a fulfilment of Canadian ideals, not a violation of them. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and the Iranian mulloocracy disrespect peace, order and good government. Canada's controversial, principled prime minister has once again showed that he understands what each of those core concepts means.

Actually, we should ask the opposite question. What made serious, good, idealistic Canadians start believing that appeasement was the Canadian way? Diplomacy is, of course, a noble pursuit. And peace is preferable to war. But history teaches that frequently strength, morality and vision are the best guarantors of peace – especially when facing evil, ambitious, greedy powers. As every parent knows, giving in often makes unacceptable behaviours worse, not better.

Canadian academics and politicians took a lead role in trying to heal the world after the horrors of World War II. The Canadian contribution to the drafting of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with McGill University's John Peters Humphrey taking the lead, is a justifiable source of pride to Canadians. Similarly, Lester Pearson did great work in teaching the world that human rights standards should be universal and that peace can be achieved through what Winston Churchill called "jaw jaw" not "war war."

Gil Troy
in Montreal

But Pearson was no relativist. Among his great achievements was helping the world recognize its obligation to support the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine in the 1947 United Nations Partition Plan. Supporting the initiative entailed taking a stand, articulating a moral position and rocking the boat. Similarly, when he said in his speech accepting the Nobel Peace Prize that "ideas are explosive," Pearson was acknowledging the power of ideas, while admitting that some ideas can be forces for good, even as others can be extremely harmful.

Unfortunately, the cataclysmic 1960s upset the moral compass of many of Pearson's and Humphrey's successors. As the United Nations degenerated from the world's democracies' attempt to spread democratic principles worldwide into the Third World dictators' debating society, many in the West lost heart. Rather than defending the universality of certain key principles such as human rights, they succumbed as a crass coalition of Soviets, Arabs and Third World Communists politicized and thus polluted the human rights apparatus in the UN and elsewhere.

On Nov. 10, 1975, when the U.S. Ambassador Daniel Patrick Moynihan – a Stephen Harper precursor – stood strong against the "Zionism is racism" resolution, he was making a stand against the new perverted world order that was emerging. Saul Rae, father of interim Liberal Leader Bob Rae and the Canadian ambassador to the UN at the time, supported Moynihan and denounced the infamous antisemitic and anti-democratic resolution.

But the resolution passed, and the appeasers caved.

Since the 1960s, many in the West have been more guilt-ridden than principled. Suitably abashed at the West's culpability in an earlier era's crimes of colonialism, imperialism and racism, many have refused to stand up to the new criminals of today, because they're still seeking forgiveness for those earlier sins. But a moral inversion has occurred, as some of the victims have become victimizers, which is what is occurring with Islamist terrorists and the Iranians.

Since the 1979 revolution, the Iranian mullahs have harassed their own people, devastated their own economy and violated their own culture's character. Moreover, they violated centuries-long international rules by kidnapping and holding American diplomats hostage, they entered into a bloody war with Iraq that caused more than one million deaths, and they have threatened Israel – and the United States – with destruction. Persian civilization was sophisticated, disciplined, and tolerant for its day. Iranian Islamism has been crude, violent and infamously intolerant in an increasingly tolerant era. Now, this outlaw regime is seeking nuclear weapons, and progressing rapidly in its perverse quest.

I confess: I don't get it. How is it progressive or peace-seeking or in any way Canadian to indulge these monsters in their immoral pursuits? We need to echo Moynihan in his eloquent denunciations. And we need to follow Harper's way, refusing to conduct "business as usual" with regimes that are unnaturally evil.

Judaism for atheists

Although polls differ, between 25 and 30 per cent of all Canadians say they're atheists, and Jews within that demographic are part and parcel of our synagogues and community organizations. They're lucky, because in Judaism, there's no catechism and no creed to profess when you walk in the door.

This summer, I read a very thoughtful book called Religion for Atheists: A Non-Believers Guide to the Uses of Religion by Alain de Botton, who argues that religion has very important lessons to teach the secular world, and non-believers in particular.

Religion's deep appeal is that it addresses legitimate and longstanding human needs that science and strict rationality do not address. He suggests the world's religions are packed with good ideas on how to live and arrange our societies, as well as how to build a sense of community, make our relationships last, overcome feelings of envy and inadequacy, inspire travel and reconnect with the natural world. They promote morality, train minds, and encourage gratitude. They offer role models who are not film stars or rock singers, but courageous, loyal, generous and unselfish human beings.

They have texts that offer well-structured guidance into how to live, texts whose main thrust is to teach wisdom.

This is specifically true for me as a Jew. Judaism inspires us toward tikkun olam, making the world a better place. Judaism requires, values and instills intellectual discourse and critical thinking. Judaism offers time-tested rituals that don't rely on technology, wealth or talent, but console, spark discussion, lend meaning and bring comfort. Judaism teaches us to be both gentle and demanding on ourselves. It offers hope. And because Judaism teaches that humans did not bring the planet into being, we learn that it's not ours to control or own.

Many of the books that trash religion make a point of how much evil has been perpetrated in the name of religion and in the name of God. And yet I know that so much good – charity, art, literature, works of great beauty, majestic architecture, and entire social safety networks with old age homes, schools and hospitals – has also been created in the name of religion and God.

We can point out how horrible, abusive and power-hungry some religious leaders can be. I know that ministers, priests and even rabbis have done horrific things that I'd rather not mention. But I also know of so many religious leaders who have inspired the world, who have moved mountains and melted guns and turned swords into plowshares because of their belief that God has commanded them to do so.

I'm aware of all the wrongs of organized religion – which is why I prefer Judaism, because it's a very disorganized religion.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein
in Toronto

For me, a belief in a higher power is tested often but rings true. For me, that belief is not inimical to modernity, but filled with metaphors and images I find deeply comforting, artistically nourishing and intellectually challenging. Ever since I was little, I've felt a presence in my life that I can't explain rationally. But that's not to say that those who don't believe in God can't find Judaism – and specifically a theistic and traditional synagogue – richly rewarding.

We can take religion's most redeeming qualities – the gifts that science can't give us: community, stability, family, tikkun olam and rituals; connection to something greater than ourselves; responsibility for our families, our neighbours, our planet, our bodies and our souls, and sanctified time, beautiful spaces, self-reflection, self-improvement, hope, meaning and purpose – and in those find spirituality that enriches our lives as Jews.

I believe we all have a soul – whether you call it spirit, mind, psyche, imagination, heart, selfhood, transcendence, essence or whatever. It's a part of us that deeply needs to be fed and sustained by religious ideals. I pray as a rabbi that Judaism will be the tool that each of us can turn to, in one way or another, to feed and sustain that inner piece, no matter what we believe its source is. And I hope that this is a prayer that even the non-believers among us can "Amen" to.

Testing the limits of reconciliation

Paul Saltzman ran into Byron (Delay) de la Beckwith Jr. in 1965 on the steps of a county courthouse in Greenwood, Miss.

It was not an amiable meeting.

De la Beckwith, accompanied by a bunch of rowdies, punched Saltzman in the head after asking him his name. Spinning from the blow to his left temple, Saltzman fell to one knee, but managed to escape.

Five years ago, after a 42-year hiatus, Saltzman met de la Beckwith once again. This time, he oozed old school Southern charm. "Good to see you again, pal," he said, laughing and grinning.

If you're wondering what accounts for de la Beckwith's startling transformation, tune in to Saltzman's film, The Last White Knight, which was premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival in September and is scheduled to be broadcast by the Super Channel next February.

Saltzman, a Toronto-based movie and television producer and director, made the move to determine whether reconciliation between himself and de la Beckwith was achievable.

"I wanted to explore whether former enemies whose views are diametrically opposed can actually make peace with each other without aggression and violence," he explained. "My goal was neither to blame him, nor to judge him. And it was certainly not to change him."

The Last White Knight, screened 50 years after the University of Mississippi was racially integrated by the admission of African-American student James Meredith, unfolds against the backdrop of turmoil and racism in that southern state and features interviews with, among others, the imperial wizard of the Mississippi White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan.

Saltzman, named after the African American singer Paul Robeson, joined the struggle for equal rights in America in the summer of 1965, when civil rights workers like himself went south to challenge institutional segregation and Jim Crow laws in voter registration drives.

The single event that galvanized Saltzman was the murder of James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner in 1964. The threesome, members of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, were killed by the Ku Klux Klan in league with local law enforcement officers.

Sheldon Kirshner

Saltzman, then a university student, was deeply affected by the search for and discovery of their bodies. "I was aghast and wanted to help," he recalled. "I wanted to do my small part to help right the wrongs of preventing people from voting because of the colour of their skin. So the next summer, I headed south. My parents were afraid for me, but they were also proud of me."

Shortly after arriving in Mississippi, a bastion of the confederacy where he would spend three months, he was arrested and imprisoned for 10 days in Jackson, the state capital. He shared a cell with 15 white civil rights workers, 12 of whom were Jewish.

"At that moment, I discarded my own prejudices," he said, explaining that he had internalized biased views about black people from childhood friends.

Upon being released from jail, Saltzman was assigned to Greenwood, a town in the Mississippi Delta and a centre of the civil rights movement. No sooner had he arrived in Greenwood than he was assaulted by de la Beckwith, whose father was a high-ranking member of the Ku Klux Klan, a founder of the White Citizens Council – whose objective was to stop the tide of desegregation in the southern states – and the man ultimately convicted of murdering Medgar Evers, the field secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Mississippi, in 1963.

After Saltzman was punched by de la Beckwith, FBI agents advised him to leave Greenwood. He then worked for the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee in three other Mississippi towns: Sison, Vicksburg and Biloxi.

In The Last White Knight, de la Beckwith says he hit Saltzman because he was trying to have "a little fun" and let him know that he and fellow travellers were not welcome in Greenwood. "They were infringing on our territory," he says.

Saltzman interviewed de la Beckwith during five trips to Mississippi, to which he began returning in 2006, around the time he decided to make Prom Night in Mississippi, his first film about the state.

He found de la Beckwith friendly yet largely unrepentant. Still a member of the Ku Klux Klan, he expects to be one until he dies. Describing it as "a fine Christian organization," he admits he participated in African-American church burnings and attacks on Freedom Riders.

As the film proceeds, de la Beckwith calls Saltzman a "nigger lover" and claims that "Jews control all the money and the media."

Implying he is not antisemitic, he says that he is on good terms with local Jews, that he likes Saltzman and considers him a friend, and that he is annoyed only by the "others," Jews whom he refrains from identifying.

In passing, he observes that African-Americans are not as advanced as whites and claims that U.S. President Barack Obama is a Muslim and a "direct descendant of the devil" who will destroy the United States "if we leave him in power."

Claiming he does not hate African-Americans and has since mellowed, de la Beckwith says his ideas were formed when he was a youth. Acknowledging he may be misguided, he admits he is "the last of my kind," disclosing his children do not share his views.

Although he lambastes Saltzman's 1960s civil rights activities, he says their friendship, supposedly embedded in respect and understanding, is an example of reconciliation.

"He and I have reached a place of reconciliation," Saltzman said, adding he considers him a "warm acquaintance" rather than a friend.

"What I like about Delay is his courage to change," said Saltzman. "His courage to vote for some black politicians. His courage to see that Evers was right in what he was doing. I also like that he was willing to admit that maybe his idea of Jews controlling the money and the media is wrong."

Saltzman suspects that de la Beckwith, hunted by his past and perhaps haunted by his future, may pay dearly for his candour and willingness to change. "He may catch a lot of flack back home for such thoughts and beliefs," said Saltzman, noting that he has yet to see his film.

"If there is a message in my film, it's that non-violent communication is possible, even between former enemies. It's possible to coexist peacefully, even with extreme differences."

The South has changed dramatically since his altercation with de la Beckwith 47 years ago, he said. "It's better in terms of race relations, but it still has a way to go to become a pluralistic society."

Having made two films about Mississippi, Saltzman may now grasp what native son and novelist William Faulkner meant when he once said, "To understand the world, one must first understand a place like Mississippi."

Book shows Israel's contribution to technology

Frances Kraft

Rabbi Stephen Wise says he loves Israel so much he would even jump out of a plane to promote the country.

He did exactly that in Dundas, Ont. on Sept. 27, in conjunction with the release of his new book, Israel: Repairing the World. Holding a copy "as though my life depended on it," he jumped 10,500 feet, releasing the book as his parachute deployed.

"Some lucky fan is going to have a book drop on their front lawn," he quipped.

The large, slim $11.99 paperback, with many tidbits of information about Israeli innovations, is geared mainly to youngsters in grades 3 to 7. There is also an interactive iPad app available from the publisher's website (blueappleworks.com) for $9.99.

"I've always wanted to get the message across to kids about the great things Israel has been doing in the world today," Rabbi Wise, a father of three, told The C/JN.

The 38-year-old spiritual leader of Shaarei Beth-El Congregation in Oakville, Ont. was inspired in part by hearing Amir Gissin – then Israeli consul general to Toronto and Western Canada – speak about the message his office wanted to get across.

Gissin was instrumental in having the new book placed in Israeli consulates around the world, Rabbi Wise said.

In a back-cover endorsement, Gissin wrote, "Though the international news media tends to focus on conflict issues, much of the real news – that is, news about cutting-edge, up-to-the-minute developments – gets overlooked."

The rabbi is passionate about the subject of his book. "Israel is considered the best place in the world for research and development outside of Silicon Valley. We don't have natural resources. We have difficult borders, and difficult neighbours. The climate is not great. We don't have water, we have desert, but look at what Israel's done," he said.

"We have farming and irrigation techniques that are incredible. They've given these technologies to sub-Saharan countries. We don't hear about that in the news."

The rabbi said he was "blown away" on his first trip to Israel at age 11, when he realized that "what I was learning at Bialik Hebrew Day School was coming alive before my eyes."

Since then, he's been back more than a dozen times, including a year of study as a rabbinical student at Hebrew Union College and more recently, to lead trips and do a charity bike ride.

He spoke of Israeli medical teams helping countries around the world in crisis, and the development of the "Israeli bandage," which can double as a tourniquet and is used by American soldiers. "Israel is contributing all these gifts to the world," he said.

Probably his favourite, he added, is an electric car system and a country-wide network of battery charging stations that's been set up in Israel.

Rabbi Wise, who began working on the book in earnest in the spring, said he's been collecting articles about Israel for years, and has used the information in sermons and lectures.

"I felt like I've got to get this all together into one place," he said.

Over the coming months, the rabbi has speaking engagements lined up in several North American cities. In Canada, he'll be at the Leo Baeck Day School Book Fair in Toronto, Oct. 30-31; Temple Israel in Ottawa, Nov. 3; Temple Emanu-El-Beth Shalom in Montreal, Jan. 18-19, and Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, Jan. 27.

Panellists take aim at United Church

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A retired Lutheran pastor recently told this story to a largely Jewish audience: For many years, a husband abused his wife badly. Finally the two parties agreed to a divorce. Years later, the wife became embroiled in a property dispute with her neighbour that ended up in court. Unexpectedly, the ex-husband appeared on the scene and volunteered to testify – on behalf of the neighbour against his wife.

"That testimony is tainted by that ugly past no matter how much the abusive husband says he's changed."

An interesting tale, no doubt, but Rev. Glenn Nelson, wasn't actually talking about a domestic dispute. He was raising the analogy to illustrate the way some Christian churches have turned against Jews in their conflict with the Palestinians.

"Christians like to think they've changed, renounced pogroms, Good Friday prayers for the perfidious Jews... That ugly history, that mindset still taints us," he said. "Frankly, I feel like the abusive husband, that our history against the Jews means we can't be trusted. Not yet."

Rev. Nelson made those comments during an Oct. 18 panel discussion on "Boycotts, the United Church and the future of interfaith dialogue," at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

He was joined by Beth Tikvah Rabbi Jarrod Grover, as well as Steve McDonald, associate director of communications for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), and Barbara Boraks, executive director of Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto. Israeli Consul General D.J. Shneeweiss delivered opening remarks.

Each of the speakers discussed the implications of the decision by the General Council of the United Church of Canada to pass a resolution at its most recent convocation in August calling for the boycott of West Bank Israeli goods.

Rev. Nelson said, "Christian churches, as institutions, have no credibility. Our history disqualifies us."

Advocating a boycott hinders the ability of the churches for self-examination, doesn't hurt Israel and sows discord at home, he said.

He suggested that on an individual level, Christians could raise concerns about Israeli policy, but at the institutional level, "I feel it's just plain wrong."

Boraks, who's served as executive director of Christian-Jewish Dialogue for more than 20 years, said the two sides had worked hard to develop trust over the years. "I understand that the United Church boycott is very difficult for the Jewish community, including the silence of other Christian communities. It's a reminder of other silences that took place."

Members of Christian-Jewish Dialogue were present at the United Church convention and worked behind the scenes in an attempt to derail the boycott resolution. Those attempts had been successful at previous conventions but failed at the most recent one, she said.

Boraks called for continued dialogue between Jews and the United Church. You can't stop talking, she said. "If you have a vacuum, it will be filled by people not necessarily of good faith."

A different perspective was offered by CIJA's McDonald. CIJA attended the United Church conference and lobbied to keep the boycott resolution off the table, to ensure "the parameters of the discussion never goes off the edge," he said.

But CIJA's arguments "went in one ear and out the other."

Afterward, CIJA decided it would end dialogue with the United Church at the national level, but continue with local churches.

Rabbi Grover said the United Church boycott resolution was only part of a larger, disturbing development in which liberal churches are taking direct aim at Israel.

Liberal Protestant churches in the United States "picked Shmini Atzeret, when they knew Jews were engaged in other business, and without prior notice, petitioned Congress to stop all foreign aid to Israel," he said.

"They did this behind the backs of their Jewish counterparts that they'd been working with on dialogue for all this time."

The Protestants' letter was signed by leaders of the Presbyterian Church (USA), the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, the United Methodist Church, the National Council of Churches USA and the United Church of Christ. Afterward, mainstream Jewish groups unilaterally pulled out of an annual Christian-Jewish roundtable meeting, saying the forum was no longer viable.

Rabbi Grover said the letter to the U.S. Congress was part of "an effort to delegitimize Israel and target aid to Israel, which is really taking root in liberal Protestant churches. We've got a real serious problem," he stated.

Rabbi Grover said these developments put into question the value of interfaith dialogue.

"I'm feeling there are others who don't want dialogue with me. They've decided their priorities and they're not interested in what we have to say," he said.

Government helped fund Lebovic campus in Vaughan

He said putting aside the school funding issue, which Farber admitted is a big area of disagreement, "this is the same premier that created business deals on scientific research... between Ontario and Israel, and who forged an intense and close relationship with [Israeli President] Shimon Peres. This was a man who understood Jewish values and ensured that the Ontario government understood as well."

McGuinity's government gave a $15-million grant to help the community build the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan and also declared May to be Jewish Heritage Month.

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center Canada (FSWC), said his organization was happy to have worked with the premier during his time in office.

FSWC "was pleased to have the opportunity to work with the McGuinity government on programs supporting tolerance, freedom and democracy," Benlolo said. "We wish the premier all the best in his future endeavours and look forward to furthering our positive relationship with the next leader."

Some Jewish parents, however, had harsh words for McGuinity.

Ira Walfish, chair of Ontario's Multifaith Coalition for Equal Funding of Faith Based Schools, said the premier "doesn't leave an honourable legacy," particularly with respect to the school funding issue.

He recalled that one of McGuinity's first actions when he became premier in 2003 was to retroactively cancel the Tories' Equity in Education Tax Credit, "which would have given parents $3,500 per child towards choosing the best education for their child."

Walfish said McGuinity "manipulated the issue of funding faith-based schools" to win the 2007 Ontario election by using "unfounded fear-mongering and implicitly attacking faith-based communities."

Added Walfish: "Ironically, the 'education' premier excluded many thousands of children in Ontario from publicly funded education, for political purposes. One can only hope that the next Liberal leader will be more enlightened and honest in his or her dealings with school choice, an issue that is not going away."

A spokesperson for McGuinity said he had no comment for this story.

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Judi Angel, a Vancouver photographer who, with her husband, has participated in three "tikkun olam" missions in the developing world for the American Jewish World Service, is the driving force behind Tikkun Olam, a photography exhibition that opens this week at the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum in Toronto.

Tikkun olam is a Hebrew phrase that means "healing the world," something Angel was clearly involved in last year in Cambodia, where she helped a local HIV/AIDS organization develop fundraising techniques and build an organizational structure.

Many of her Cambodian photographs show poor but contented people living simple but spiritually fulfilling lives amidst a backdrop of squalor, with many draped in colourful costumes as though to counterbalance the drabness of their environment. Although the tikkun olam theme does not seem evident in the photos, Angel says it is present nonetheless.

"When I came back from Uganda after our first placement (in 2004), I was sort of angry all the time," she said in a telephone interview. "All the people I had met were so poor and had so little, yet they seemed really happy and content and generous of spirit. And people here have so much, yet they're grumpy and seem to complain about such little things. The images are partly meant to show that difference and to help bridge that gap."

Angel took about 20,000 digital photographs in Cambodia, only about 20 of which – blown up to about 20 by 28 inches in size – were chosen for the exhibition.

At curator Dorion Liebgott's suggestion, Angel also included several striking black and white images that she took of the Abayudaya Jewish community in Uganda, including exterior and interior views of the synagogue. While Angel's Cambodian photographs were previously on view in the Sidney and Gertrude Zack Gallery in Vancouver, her Ugandan photos have never been publicly exhibited before.

"I was very impressed with the photographs I saw in Vancouver and I really wanted to bring them here," Liebgott said. "In a way, it's a very different sort of exhibit than we've ever done before because a good number of the photographs are really not of Jewish content."

From exhibit at the Beth Tzedec museum

But, she added, the photos seem to reflect the artist's "Jewish imperative" of tikkun olam.

The mission of the American Jewish World Service "is healing the world," Angel said. "It's a Jewish organization that does work all over the developing world in a 'colour-blind' way. They go wherever they are needed and do things that are different than what any other organization does." A representative of the AJWS will attend the exhibition's opening, she said.

An opening reception for Tikkun Olam takes place at Beth Tzedec Congregation, 1700 Bathurst St., Tuesday, Oct. 30, 7:30 p.m. The reception is free and open to the public. Please RSVP to Avital at info@beth-tzedec.org or 416-781-3511. The exhibition continues to Jan. 30, 2013.

Breslever rabbi offers 'remedies for the soul'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

"Why are we losing so many kids to Judaism?" asks Rabbi Lazer Brody. "It's very simple: because in the young people's eyes, Judaism is not cool."

"If you don't have a Judaism of joy, if Judaism is a pain – [kosher] chicken costs double, synagogue dues are so high, it's all kvetching and complaining – who needs it?"

The 63-year-old Breslev chassidic rabbi, who grew up in a Conservative home before making aliyah in 1970 and serving in the IDF special forces, believes that the heart of Judaism is emunah, or faith.

Next month, he'll speak in Toronto and Edmonton as part of a North American tour.

At Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, he will discuss "How faith can enhance your life" (Tues., Nov. 13, 7:30 p.m.), and "Why are we losing so many of our children to the negative forces, and how can we help get them back?" (Wed., Nov. 14, 7:30 p.m.) Tickets are $10 at the door for each lecture.

In Edmonton, he will speak on Mon., Nov. 12 at 7:30 p.m. at the Fantasyland Hotel. His subject will be "The 'Rambo' Rabbi – Discovering God from the battlefield to our daily lives."

Rabbi Brody's spiritual journey began after the First

Rabbi Lazer Brody

Lebanon War in 1982, when he survived a commando mission in Beirut. "There was no way of getting out of there alive," he said in a phone interview from Israel. "And when I got out of there alive, I knew there was a higher power."

As a ba'al tshuvah, he studied with an eclectic range of Orthodox rabbis, and received rabbinic smichah from Aish HaTorah in 1992. He was drawn to the Breslev philosophy, he said, because its founder, Rabbi Nachman of Breslev, who lived in the late 1700s and early 1800s, was "a doctor of the soul of all time."

Rabbi Brody is a disciple of Rabbi Shalom Arush, whose books he translated from Hebrew to English. Rabbi Brody said that Rabbi Arush brings Rabbi Nachman's teachings to the current generation.

Likewise, he said, he and Rabbi Arush offer "remedies for the soul" that affect "every phase of your life." He cited happiness, personal potential, marriage and children as examples. Rabbi Brody's third book, The Trail to Tranquility – his first in English – was published in 2010.

Growing up in a Zionist home, the Washington, D.C., native, whose late father was born in Winnipeg, prepared for aliyah by becoming a high school and college athlete, and studying agriculture at the University of Maryland. "I wanted to be a settler on a border farm," he said.

He still runs, works out, and eschews processed foods. "I don't put garbage in my body, and I don't put garbage in my mind."

Rabbi Brody said the Breslev community in Israel is "completely non-political, and we try to be the glue of society" to bridge gaps between different sectors.

His goal, he said, is not to bring people to his way of thinking, but to get them to be as much themselves as they can be, and to connect them to God. "Once you do that, I don't need to interfere any more... The Almighty will tell you exactly what you need to do."

Hundreds JUMP for joy at anniversary party

Cara Edell

Special to The CJN

More than 500 young Jewish professionals recently came together for Jewish Urban Meeting Place's (JUMP) fourth annual anniversary party.

Located in midtown Toronto, JUMP is a non-profit organization that provides social, volunteer and educational programs for people between the ages of 22 to 34.

The party, held on Oct. 13 at the Storys Building in downtown Toronto, raised funds to support JUMP's mission of empowering young Jewish adults to become more engaged in their heritage and more active in the community.

"The funds we raise help us meet an increasing demand for programming in our centre," said Shlomo Buzaglo, director of programs and trips at JUMP. "The support that we receive through our large events goes toward subsidizing the fees that participants pay for our programming – from Israel trips, to Hebrew classes, to holiday parties."

On average, 400 people come through JUMP's doors every month, he said. "The success that we have experienced is a reflection of our ability to engage the community."

This year's event, driven by a volunteer committee led by Laura Licht, Michael Grossman, Teri Goodfellow and Daniel Warner, featured live music, a silent disco, vodka snow cones, freshly made mini donuts and other fun carnival foods. Aside from ticket sales, JUMP also raised funds through a raffle, with packages worth more than $10,000. Ten lucky winners walked away with prizes, including trips to Las Vegas and New York City.

"This party was an opportunity for young Jewish adults to connect with each other – to share ideas, build new relationships and become energized about the amazing things that are happening in our community," said Buzaglo.

The event's theme was based on the ways JUMP has affected the lives of thousands of young Jewish adults, he said. "Our desire to share these experiences with the community happened to tie in nicely with the name of the event venue, the Storys Building."

Throughout the evening, JUMP participants displayed their stories using a variety of media formats. Memories were shared via an interactive Twitter campaign, as decorative pieces throughout the venue, and on six large television screens.

"When asked to speak about her experiences at JUMP, one of our dedicated volunteers, Kourtney Shapiro, commented that 'JUMP represents a niche within the Toronto Jewish community which celebrates the art of networking, learning and creating for young adults.' This is the message that we wanted to leave with the young adults who attended our anniversary party," said Buzaglo.

JUMP plays an important role in the Toronto Jewish community because of the demographic with which the organization works, he said. "The post-university, pre-marriage stage of life is crucial for the survival of the Jewish people because it represents the time when individuals decide what kind of a Jewish life they want to lead. JUMP addresses the needs of young Jewish professionals by providing a space to connect with peers, explore Jewish values and practice, and engage in the Jewish community."

In any given month, JUMP offers eight to 12 programs, provides volunteers to other organizations who are in need, and hosts more than 120 people for Shabbat dinners.

"The needs of our demographic are increasing and therefore our organization needs to be able to provide for them. That is why fundraisers such as the anniversary party are key to ensuring financial stability for the organization."

Buzaglo said there is something for everyone within JUMP's walls. "People connect easily to our young, energetic staff and to the way we value authentic Jewish experiences. Our participants also thrive on our grassroots approach, where they can develop an idea in our centre and see it through to fruition."

Kotel the 'Grand Central Station of the Jewish People'

"The true Jew is someone who will ensure that his grandchildren will be Jewish. Therefore, every Jew has to do all he or she can to ensure the next generation will be Jewish. This isn't an easy thing.

"We live in an open, materialistic world with many challenges to Judaism, and I respect Canadian Jews who do this."

One of the ways Jews can achieve this, he said, is to visit the Kotel.

"It does something to a Jew that almost can't be explained. It penetrates his heart and unleashes the Jewish fire that resides there," he said.

Referring to Canada's support for Israel, he extended his "deepest appreciation" to this country's Jewish community, but he reserved a special message for the current Conservative government and Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

"They were the first to take a courageous stand against Iran. And I believe in the end, the rest of the world will follow in Canada's footsteps."

Rabbi Rabinowitz, who has been rabbi of the Western Wall since 1995, said it was a great honour to be named the rabbi of the Kotel.

"It's the Grand Central Station of the Jewish People," said Rabbi Rabinowitz, 42. "I don't have the words to explain why I received this privilege, but I know it's a huge honour. I'm the rabbi of the largest synagogue in the world."

Among other things, he said, his rabbinical duties include ensuring the sanctity of the Kotel and hosting foreign dignitaries to the Western Wall as their "Jewish representative."

Most importantly, he said, his duty is to help encourage and teach about the site's heritage and importance to the next generation of Jews.

He said that over the last few years, interest in attending services at the Kotel has increased among the younger generation, and more than 1.5 million people came for services during the High Holidays this year.

Those are encouraging numbers, considering that many attendees were secular Jews, he said.

According to his figures, an average of 10 million people visit the Kotel every year. And the number of prayer notes and messages left in the wall by visitors is "impossible to know."

Rabbi Rabinowitz oversees the removal and burial of every note from the wall twice annually – before Passover and before Rosh Hashanah.

"Each note is treated as if it were a sefer Torah," he said.

Experiencing the House

An Oct. 15 event titled "Experience the House" gave donors to the mid-town Toronto organization a chance to experience first hand the kind of educational programming available there for young Jewish adults.

About 75 people enjoyed a discussion on Jewish life. The event introduced two regular participants at the House, who described how its programming has helped them "live their lives Jewishly," according to House board member Eli Fleischmann. Then, Rabbi Rafi Lipner furthered the discussion with the audience.

"It was a very good talk," Fleischmann said. "Rafi is a very engaging speaker, which is part of the charm of going to an event at the House."

Connecting the dots illustrates Iranian threat

On Oct. 15, the Globe and Mail reported the results of a recent Ipsos Reid poll of Canadian and American perceptions about, among other things, threats to international peace and stability.

According to this survey, in a ranking of the greatest global threats, Canadians placed international terrorism first, famine and food shortages second and a nuclear-armed Iran third. Not surprisingly, given the lingering effects of 9/11 and subsequent disclosures of other terrorist plots that have been thwarted, Americans listed international terrorism as the greatest threat, but they placed a nuclear-armed Iran second. (Though they're less directly affected, it's significant that Canadians share the same concern.)

Still, one might wonder if Iran would rank even higher on the concern index in Canada if Tehran's ties to international terrorism were better understood – in short, if the dots were connected.

Perhaps this is what Americans have more clearly grasped since the U.S. State Department several years ago listed Iran as the world's principal sponsor of international terrorism. Iran's nefarious acts extend from Asia to Africa to South America and even to the United States itself. Just last year, American officials uncovered an Iranian plot to assassinate the Saudi ambassador to the U.S. by blowing up a popular Washington restaurant he frequents – a terrorist act that would have resulted in mass civilian casualties.

Mansour Arbabsiar, an Iranian-American charged in that plot, pleaded guilty in a Federal District Court in New York City on Oct. 17 to conspiring to commit an act of terrorism. Arbabsiar admitted to having worked with Iranian military officials. A co-conspirator also charged in the case, Gholam Shakuri, who is believed to belong to the Quds Force, remains at large. (The Quds Force is the lead unit of Iran's Revolutionary Guards Corps tasked with planning and carrying out terrorist attacks abroad.)

In addition, Iran provides logistic, financial and military assistance not only to movements such as Hezbollah in Lebanon and Islamic Jihad (and previously to Hamas) in Gaza, but also to insurgent groups in Afghanistan (and previously in Iraq) that have carried out attacks on western multinational forces. Iran is also active even in Egypt through its sponsorship of jihadist groups operating in the mostly lawless Sinai.

Currently, Hassan Nasrallah's Hezbollah fighters are busy, along with Iranian Revolutionary Guards, helping to keep President Bashar Assad's beleaguered Syrian regime alive. Susan Rice, American ambassador to the UN, told the Security Council last week that "Nasrallah's fighters are now part of Assad's killing machine, and Hezbollah's leaders continue to plot with Iran new measures to prop up a murderous and desperate dictator."

At the same session, Israel's ambassador to the UN, Ron Prosor, challenged Nasrallah's claim that he's defending Lebanon against Israel: "Today on the streets of Homs, Hama, and Damascus, we see that Hezbollah's army is far more preoccupied with butchering their Arab brothers and sisters in Syria... Ahmadinejad and Nasrallah sit on Bashar al-Assad's advisory board, offering the Tyrant of Damascus guidance on how to butcher the Syrian people more efficiently. Together they form what I call a 'trio of terror.'"

According to the British newspaper the Telegraph (Oct.

17), Hezbollah escalated the fighting by using its military bases in the Bekaa Valley in Lebanon to fire rockets on positions held by the Free Syrian Army across the border in Syria. That also means hitting villages and killing civilians.

Returning briefly to the nuclear issue to further connect the dots mentioned above, we should note that a nuclear-armed Iran could equip any one or more of these terrorist groups with tactical nuclear devices (or even a "dirty" bomb) to use against Israel or any number of other targets. Given that Iran itself wouldn't have to launch a nuclear bomb (though it would have the capacity to do so), the regime's ability to wreak devastation would be manifold – and, unless checked, remains profoundly dangerous.

Carleton praised for tackling Jews' unease

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Jewish groups are praising Carleton University for recognizing the concerns of some Jewish staff and students about an antisemitic atmosphere on campus and for pledging to implement recommendations in a new report on the problem.

The Commission on Inter-Cultural, Inter-Religious and Inter-Racial Relations on Campus began collecting information in 2010 in response to growing tensions at the Ottawa school. Its final report – which also addressed issues facing aboriginal staff and students – suggested that for the most part, Jewish students and professors responded less positively than their non-Jewish counterparts when asked about the climate of respect on campus.

The commission sent out two surveys – one to Car-leton's roughly 30,000 staff, students and faculty that received about 2,000 responses, and a second follow-up questionnaire for Jewish faculty, staff and students that was answered by 135 people.

The commission found that Jewish students, particularly those who are easily identified as Jewish, view public spaces on campus as somewhat unsafe or unwelcoming. Some also said they have experienced disrespectful comments about their religion stemming from anti-Israel sentiments.

Carleton's undergraduate and graduate student associations have both taken public stances against Israel in the past, which has led some Jewish students to feel excluded from these representative bodies, the commission noted.

Additionally, Jewish students said they sometimes feel excluded in classes because of what they say is a lack of balanced debate about Israel.

Carleton president Roseann O'Reilly Runte declined to comment to The CJN on the 11-page report. She did, however, release a statement detailing some of the actions she said the university will take based on its recommendations, such as reminding deans, chairs, and directors to be mindful of Jewish holidays so that no meetings are scheduled on them.

"As a progressive and open university, we must aim to make every visitor to campus, every scholar, all who live and work here, feel valued and respected," she wrote.

The commission also recommended that Carleton set up an interfaith council, as well as a Jewish issues committee.

In addition, Runte said the university will "make support services and mechanisms for the airing of concerns better known."

Zane Colt, citywide president of Ottawa's Israel Awareness Committee, called Carleton's creation of the commission an unprecedented action by the university in taking responsibility for the student body, and in recognizing problems on campus and trying to solve them.

"[The university] should be applauded for the initiative," he said, noting that few universities have ever taken such a move.

Colt, a third-year student in public affairs and policy management, said he has experienced feeling uneasy in classes at Carleton.

"There are professors in classrooms that try to present one side of the issue, and it makes students that are Jewish and pro-Israel feel very threatened," he said, citing guest speakers who only present one side of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"By all means, I like debate, I encourage debate, but this is when that debate crosses the line and becomes hateful, harassment and intimidation," he said, acknowledging that it's not the majority of the campus population, but marginal anti-Israel groups that go too far.

Runte has called out such groups in the past. In March 2011, students who support the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel disrupted a board of governors meeting to the point where it had to be cancelled, since board members were blocked from entering.

"Those who have said they will interrupt meetings until they have their way are participating in inappropriate bullying tactics," Runte wrote at the time in an email sent to students and faculty.

Two years earlier, the university banned posters advertising Israeli Apartheid Week that Carleton's equity services office deemed were in violation of Carleton's human rights policy.

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon

Wiesenthal Center, also praised the administration. "It's not a factor of a freedom of speech," he said. "It's a factor of creating divisiveness on campus and marginalizing the Jewish students."

David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said the problem extends beyond Carleton to other universities, adding that Carleton has set an important example for how other schools can approach the issue.

"As disgusting as the anti-Israel rhetoric can be, the core problem is that, from time to time, this rhetoric has devolved into harassment of Jewish and pro-Israel students," he said.

Runte's statement said the university will "continue to discuss the question of respectful behaviour in all public spaces on campus with student leaders and together we will find ways to make all feel welcome."

Not everyone is happy with the report.

Carleton sociology professor Peter Gose told the Charlatan, a campus newspaper, that it failed to distinguish between antisemitism and criticism of Israel.

"We don't think that there's anything inherent in being Jewish that obliges Jews to oppress Palestinians, to engage in these acts. This is behaviour, not identity," Gose told the paper.

In a letter to the Ottawa Citizen, he called the commission "the Runte administration's latest attempt to silence debate on the Palestinian question at Carleton."

Jewish studies not just for Jews

Judith R. Baskin

Special to the CJN

In order for the academic pursuit of Jewish studies to continue, it must appeal to a broader audience outside the Jewish community, said Judith Baskin, a Jewish scholar, author and professor.

She was speaking to a roomful of academics and community members at the Midwest Jewish Studies Association (MJSA) conference at York University on Oct. 14.

"At the end of the 21st century, more and more students who choose undergraduate majors and graduate training in Jewish studies are non-Jews," said Baskin, who has spent 40 years in the field of academic Jewish studies.

She cited changing demographics as the reason for this shift. "The absolute number of Jews in the larger population in North America is in steady decline," said Baskin. "The future of Jewish studies in North American universities will depend on the field's continuing appeal to a larger constituency."

Her lecture, "Jewish Studies: Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow?" was the plenary talk of the MJSA's annual conference, which brought students and faculty from around the world to York U last week.

Conference speakers included "musicologists, historians and scholars from all periods of Jewish studies, from biblical to modern for people all over the world," said Mara Cohen Ioannides, president of the MJSA.

ISRAEL TENNIS

Now serving 20,000 kids weekly - thanks to

Shaping lifelong champions since 1976

For 36 years the Israel Tennis Centers have been promoting the social, psychological and physical development of Israeli youth through the medium of sport.

Using the game of tennis as a framework, just over 20,000 children participated last year in Israel Tennis Centers programs from Kiryat Shmona in the north to Beer Sheva in the south. Many of the 14 Israel Tennis Centers are located in economically challenged neighborhoods and outlying development towns.

Programs for Developmentally and Physically Challenged, Arab/Jewish Coexistence Doubles, Coexistence Kindergartens, and Ethiopian community programming are among the many ITC programs - all focused on tolerance, belief in one's self and the virtues of teamwork.

That the Israel Tennis Centers turn out world class Israeli tennis champions is a fortunate and exciting by-product. Every kid can be a champion in life.

Nati Michael: A Journey from Ethiopia

Nati Michael, 13, buses to the Israel Tennis Center in Jaffa from economically-challenged South Tel Aviv for tennis lessons and to hang around.

Born in Ethiopia, Nati, his parents and siblings fled life-threatening violence and oppression for safety in Sudan, only to encounter more of the same. Running for their lives once again, Nati's family travelled by foot through the desert toward a dream of safety and a future in Israel. Under conditions of extreme heat they traversed rugged desert terrain with little food or water - Nati's father like many others did not survive the trip. With the help of Bedouins, the family reached Israel in 2008, where the single mother and her 4 children settled in South Tel Aviv, home to thousands of impoverished refugees of similar circumstances.

In 2012, Nati finished 6th grade at the Tkuma school for children with complex learning difficulties, and through a partnership between the Tel Aviv municipality and the Israel Tennis Centers, began attending subsidized ITC programs and tennis lessons at the Jaffa location of the Israel Tennis Centers. Armed with new tennis clothes, a racquet and bus transportation, in short order Nati has developed confidence and ambition - aspiring to represent Israel in tennis one day. Nati's developing leadership skill and talent earned him the honour of Israel Tennis Centers' Player of the Month this past June.

Nati is but one of thousands of children who have learned to believe in themselves at the Israel Tennis Centers. To learn how you can help us sponsor a child, a class or an entire program, please contact the Israel Tennis Centers Canadian office. A strong future for Israel will depend on strong children today.

Archeology and the cinema

The Bible and the Ancient World have been fertile ground for Hollywood and the cinema. Almost from the beginning the Ancient World has fascinated cinematographers, and it is interesting to see how archeology and archeological discoveries have affected the portrayal of the Ancient World on film. For most of us, it is the cinema that has affected the way we think of the Ancient World and arguably its most important gift to us – the Bible.

Archeology has revealed the earliest civilization as being that of the Sumerians. The famous Yale scholar Samuel Noah Kramer wrote a book awhile back with the apt title, History Begins at Sumer. It was the Sumerians who built the first cities with populations in the tens of thousands, more than 5,000 years ago, in what is now southern Iraq. They invented the first type of writing, which we call cuneiform.

Cuneiform was subsequently adopted, adapted and used by the Babylonians, Assyrians and Persians. The Sumerians invented the epic literature in their tale of Gilgamesh, who it turns out was an actual king of one of their cities called Kish. The tale speaks of a flood and even has a Noah-like character in it.

Their civilization was rediscovered at the beginning of the 20th century. Hollywood discovered it in the 1950s, when they made a film called The Mole People, about a group of Sumerians who had survived by going underground. Unfortunately, not much historical veracity survived the movie.

Babylon, which was a successor to Sumer, and adopted much of its culture, has also been fertile ground for Hollywood. It was Babylon that would have an important impact on the Bible and the development of our people. It has been the source of archeological activity for the last century and a half. Sadly, the last 11 years have destroyed many of the sites that could have told us so much more.

Past Forward

Hollywood discovered Babylon in its infancy when the famous director D. W. Griffiths made the film Intolerance in 1916. It managed to combine

2,000 years of civilization in a few hours by mixing Sumerian, Assyrian, Babylonian and Persian motifs. Considering the state of scholarship at that time, the film was not that bad in its archeological depictions.

Another forgotten civilization rediscovered by Hollywood was that of the Hittites, who were virtually unknown until German archeologists found their capital. The Hittites made their appearance in the 1954, 20th Century Fox epic, The Egyptian, based on a novel by the Finnish writer Mika Waltari, about a Moses-like character. The movie starred that stalwart of biblical epics, Victor Mature, as well as Peter Ustinov, Edmund Purdom and Michael Wilding (who was famous at the time as Mr. Elizabeth Taylor). The film was surprisingly accurate, especially in showing that the Hittites were the major adversaries of the Egyptians in the latter half of the second millennium BCE and the first to use that new wonder metal – iron. But it is the Egyptians themselves that we look at next.

Some good news, for a change

You don't have to look far to find challenging or depressing news about Israel and the Middle East in the media or online. And I would never suggest that news – even the difficult kind – should be ignored. However, there are also some delightful stories about Israel that have trouble cutting through the doom and gloom. Here's where to find the upbeat and offbeat.

Start off at israel21c.org where you can:

- Learn about 64 innovations developed in Israel – including the ReWalk robotic exoskeleton, which enables quadriplegics to walk; Disk-on-Key pocket data storage; the tile-based game, Rummikub.
- Read a profile of Dahlia Pelled, president of the Israeli Society of Magicians (and CEO of the publishing company People and Computers).
- Discover that Israel's brand-new men's lacrosse team has actually qualified to compete in the 2014 World Lacrosse Championship, to be held in Denver. This is no misprint. Israel. Lacrosse! It looks as if Michael Ordman spends quite a lot of time skimming through conventional news sites in order to compile his weekly newsletter, Good News Stories about Israel. - A video of Yehuda Gin of India's Bnei Menashe tribe of Jews who made aliyah in 1992. Now a rabbi, he talks about his unique journey and life in Israel.

Healing through listening

Rabbi Stephen Wise

I recently went to the doctor because of a nagging shoulder injury. When I got to his office, he came in and, as usual, asked me what was wrong. As he touched the joint and we talked about it, it suddenly felt better.

I'm sure everyone is familiar with this. But can doctors heal simply by seeing you, touching you and talking to you? Perhaps they can, because doctors are among the few people nowadays who have time for you. Maybe when you finally stop and tell someone the story of what ails you, it feels better.

There's much research to confirm this. Healing may indeed be facilitated by doctors who want to help, nurses who tend to your daily needs, clergy who come to your bedside to comfort your troubled spirit, and friends who share your pain.

For most of human history, conventional wisdom taught that healing can happen through the goodness of healers and caregivers. Impressive advances in the 20th century initiated a new understanding of medicine that used sophisticated diagnostic tests, pharmaceutical magic bullets and advanced surgical techniques. Yet today we know that medicine doesn't have all the answers, despite improved diagnosis, more specialists and a dazzling array of drugs.

We understand that our bodies are complex and mysterious. That's why our tradition offers the Asher Yatzar prayer to thank God daily that all our pathways and openings work correctly. Medical schools now teach clinicians to connect to patients as people, not just to their condition. We know now that the quality of doctor-patient relationships can affect medical outcomes. This effect has the power to extend to all of us, including those who might not be doctors but who may be great listeners.

In this week's parashah, Lech Lecha, Abraham calls out to God in pain, "O God what will you give me if I remain childless... You have given me no children". (Beresheet 15:2-3). In the next parashah, Vayera, Sarah speaks to Abraham with a heavy heart about her infertility. Once they share their struggles aloud, God hears their prayers and grants them a son.

My wife Cheryl and I also know this pain. We shared the frustration of infertility early in our marriage. We kept our hardship to ourselves, watching our friends and siblings conceive easily while we couldn't. We were happy for others, but secretly worried we would never share in the joy and miracle of children.

We eventually received fertility treatments and now have three wonderful children. We're keenly aware that so many have similar struggles these days. The difference is that people are more open to talking about it. When they do, Cheryl and I can share what we went through and offer advice and support.

We can't cure infertility, but by talking about it, we can reduce stress and allow room for the healing of body and spirit. I believe that's the secret to the healing touch of doctors – the relationship between two humans opens the door to healing. It's what Abraham and Sarah found when they opened up about their condition and God heard and answered their prayer.

It gives the sense of love and meaning to life when two people see in each other the image of God. And that's where true healing begins.

Rabbi Wise is spiritual leader of Shaarei-Beth El Congregation in Oakville, Ont.

Cheshvan's hidden opportunity

This month is the month of Cheshvan, and it has a unique standing in the Jewish calendar. It's the only month in the Jewish year that doesn't contain a day of significance. Whether it's a holiday or a fast day, such as Tisha b'Av, we consider these days to be significant in that they prompt us toward celebration or introspection. To have an entire month without any of these prompts certainly makes that month stand out.

Historically, this might be considered a month of sadness, since it is the month in which our matriarch, Rachel, dies while giving birth to her son Benjamin. And yet within that moment of loss lies a moment of hope.

Although Rachel succumbs and dies, Benjamin is born and another tribe is added to the nation of Israel.

The month of Cheshvan has similarities to the loss of Rachel. According to the midrash, Cheshvan is the month in which Noah's flood began. Ten generations after the world was created, God destroys everything with a flood, saving only Noah, his family and the animals that were inside the ark he built. While destruction was raging outside, hope for the future was cocooned inside the ark, which carried within it the seeds of a new world.

Similar to Rachel the matriarch who was suffering the anguish of losing her life while simultaneously bringing new life into the world, the ark represents the womb bringing new life into the world as loss of life surrounds it. In fact, the 40 days spend the month focusing on negative aspects of our lives, connecting with the event of Rachel's death, or we could focus on future opportunities, connecting with Noah's Ark.

The midrash teaches us of deeper moments of opportunity within the Noah narrative. Apparently it takes Noah 120 years to build the ark. During those years, people would ask him what he was doing, and he had the opportunity to convince them of what was going to happen and that they should join him. During these 120 years Noah failed to convince even one person. He failed to effect change or influence anyone around him. These great opportunities were not actualized, and that's why, according to the midrash, the flood is referred to as "the waters of Noah."

Cheshvan, the month following the High Holidays, is the month of choice and opportunity. We choose our focus and either commit ourselves to seizing opportunities for change or we actively miss them. By not having a specific day of significance, the choice is left to us.

and nights of rain can be seen as paralleling the 40 weeks of gestation, which combines the two images even more strongly.

Yet because the month of Cheshvan doesn't designate a particular date within it to commemorate either Rachel's death or the start of the flood, it remains our decision as to where we put our focus. We could

Exhibit captures life of Jewish children in Tehran

Expresses sense of loneliness and abandonment artist felt

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

In 1941, 900 orphaned Jewish children from Poland were brought to Tehran with a group of other Polish refugees.

The Children of Tehran, as they were known, were then taken to Palestine in 1942-43, which was under the British Mandate.

Artist Lea Vogel was one of those children. An exhibition of her artworks, titled Lea Vogel: A Life in Art (A Child of Tehran), opens on Nov. 6 and will continue to Nov. 30 at the MJG Gallery in Toronto.

The sculptures, paintings and prints in the exhibit express the sense of loneliness and abandonment Vogel felt in childhood and her optimism and joy later in life.

Vogel, who died in Toronto in March 2012, was born in Rozniatov, Poland, in 1937. She had one older sister.

There were 2,000 Jews in Rozniatov, which was under Soviet rule from 1939 to 1941. After the German invasion in 1941, the Nazis seized Vogel's father and other Jewish men. He was never seen again.

Her mother fled into the forest, but was unable to cope with the needs of both daughters. Vogel, who was a sick child, was abandoned and ultimately cared for by nuns.

As an adult, she expressed her desolation and feelings of abandonment in her print Heavens and Earth. Vogel once said that she used wood instead of the more usual technique of etching on a copper plate in tribute to her father, who was a timber grader for a lumber company.

In an interview with The CJN, Vogel's husband, David Nimmo, says, "The print is titled Heavens and Earth and not Sky and Earth, which indicates Lea's gratitude to HaShem for saving her from a terrifying sense of isolation."

Polish Gen. Wladyslaw Anders, who answered to the Polish government-in-exile in London during the war years, pressured the Soviets to release Polish refugees from the Gulag so that he could rebuild the Polish army. He arranged expeditions of Poles to areas under British control.

One of these expeditions included the 900 Jewish refugee children, including five-year-old Vogel. They walked, crossed rivers by barge and rode on trains, crossing Kazakhstan and finally arriving in Tehran.

In 1942, the Children of Tehran were moved by ship to Palestine, where many were taken in by secular Zionists. Vogel was placed in an orphanage and school in Jerusalem called Beit Zeirot Mizrahi where Nahama Leibowitz, who became a leading Torah scholar, was a teacher. Leibowitz also became a role model for Lea Vogel.

Nimmo said life was difficult for Vogel in Palestine. "There was a food shortage. Lea's resourcefulness and self-reliance was forged in what would become the new State of Israel. These traits accompanied her throughout her life.

"As a 12-year-old, she danced in the streets, celebrating the creation of Israel. This now took the place of her mother and father."

She later learned from the Jewish Agency that her mother and sister had been found in Soviet Russia. When she was 15, she helped bring them to Israel as olim, but she had difficulty re-establishing any family relationships.

Vogel's feelings from that period of her life are conveyed in a print depicting a black sky with a black rainbow.

She served in the Israeli Defence Forces

Artist Lea Vogel's sculpture Burden of Duty

in 1956-57 and had a serious jeep crash that resulted in the loss of a good portion of one breast. Her sculpture Burden of Duty is a figure dwarfed by an immense military uniform with broad shoulders, the front breast pockets of which can be seen as lacrated breasts.

In the late 1950s and 1960s, Vogel developed her talents as an artist, exhibiting at the Tel Aviv Museum. She was awarded a travelling art scholarship from the American-Israel Cultural Foundation.

In 1974, Vogel immigrated to Toronto, where she earned an honours BA in visual studies. She won many awards, and in 1983, she participated in the exhibit From Israel with Love at First Canadian Place.

Vogel's art depicts conflict, struggle, duty and redemption. It took on a more joyous celebratory and colourful tone after she arrived in Canada.

In 1991, when Lea found she had breast cancer, she virtually gave up art. Nimmo said, adding, "Lea had incredible courage and resilience in the face of cancer. She lived successfully with cancer for 21 years."

He said that in her will, written from her hospital bed three days before she died, along with bequests to hospitals, her synagogue and family, "she made a bequest to the Children's Village, Jerusalem, home of orphaned and disadvantaged girls, to repay the kindness of the strangers that not only saved her life, but enriched it."

There will be an opening reception for Lea Vogel: A Life in Art (A Child of Tehran), with a presentation by her husband, on Nov. 8 from 6 to 10 p.m. at the MJG Gallery, 555 Parliament St. Please RSVP to 416-923-4031 if you wish to attend the opening reception.

For more information about the exhibit, call Beverly Burdedyne at 416-781-8033.

Woman searches for missing family

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The C/JN

Karen Winter, who is legally deaf and blind, was determined to find out what happened to her father's family. They disappeared in Austria during the Holocaust.

Her father, Walter, and his brother Jack fled from Vienna soon after the Anschluss, the annexation of Austria by Nazi Germany in March 1938.

Their sister Gertrude, 17, and brother Wilhelm, 14, did not want to leave their parents alone. When her father tried to get them out of Vienna, the Austrian borders were shut.

In 1948, her father received a letter from the International Red Cross saying that "Mr. and Mrs. Emanuel Winter had left for an unknown destination without giving a forwarding address."

When her father died in 1976, Karen Winter says he still had no knowledge of what happened to the rest of his family.

In 1998, Winter, a corporate law researcher, had to leave work because of her disabilities. She has an Ashkenazi genetic syndrome, Usher Type 3, that affects hearing and vision in adulthood.

After her retirement, she began to seriously research her family's past through the Jewish Family Finder. She contacted the Austrian Consulate in Toronto, and they provided her with her family's address in Vienna.

In 2006, she travelled to Vienna and received documents from Vienna's City Hall. She also searched the Lodz Ghetto database, and learned that her grandparents and aunt were deported and her uncle was murdered at the Chelmo death camp.

She went to her family's former home at Staudingergasse 14 in Vienna. "Shortly after my return to Toronto, I received an email from a young man, who had recently inherited the house from his grandfather," Winter said. "He sent me a photo of a garden he had planned to pay tribute to my father's family."

Karen returned to Vienna in 2009 and met the young Austrian owner of the house, who said that he had been trying unsuccessfully to reach her after she visited the house.

In July 2012, she received a notice from the Remembrance Society in Vienna, notifying her that a ceremony to install commemorative plaques in memory of her family were to be held at the house at the end of September.

Plaques were to be installed at the entrance of the building, with her grandparents, aunt and uncle's names and the dates of their deportation.

Elizabeth Ben David-Hindler, a Jewish volunteer with the Stone of Remembrance Association in Vienna, a small private association that has six volunteers, four Jewish and two non-Jewish, told Winter that the plaques would be made but there would be a charge.

Winter was pleasantly surprised to learn that the Austrian who had inherited the house paid for the plaques.

"He is one of the Austrians who believes that remembrance work is important and he supports the project," Winter says.

Unfortunately, Winter injured her leg before leaving for Vienna and was unable to be at the commemorative plaque ceremony.

She told The C/JN that she is grateful to all the individuals who helped her memorialize her family.

She plans to make the trip to Vienna next year. "I want to see the plaques and to personally express my thanks to the young man and to the volunteers of the Remembrance Association in Vienna," she said.

New posters continue to attack Jewish leaders

Myron Love

Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The person or persons behind posters titled "Shitler's List" plastered a new set of leaflets around downtown Winnipeg earlier this month.

The new posters, which were quickly taken down, once again attacked Mayor Sam Katz and other mostly Jewish figures involved with City Hall.

They posters alleged that Katz and other members of the city's business community are involved in questionable transactions. Thirteen names on the poster were crossed off, with a suggestion they need to be "terminated."

Meanwhile, the self-described author of the posters — who remains unknown — reached out to Winnipeg's Jewish Post & News in an Oct. 3 letter to the editor to deny that his or her intentions were antisemitic.

The individual — who went by the name "gonif" — said in the letter that people see what they want to see.

"Paranoid people saw the word 'hitler' [on the poster], assumed it must be a neo-Nazi poster and called the police," the person wrote. "Others saw the S sign and assumed it was an ethnic slur against Jews and called B'nai B'rith to get the press propaganda machine rolling and summon the politicians to express their outrage.

"Clear-headed people read the entire poster and put the title into its proper context."

The title "Shitler's List," the letter-writer suggested, is a crude play on Schindler's List, a war drama about a wily con man who wastes government money to build a useless factory to employ war captives who would otherwise have been sent to Auschwitz.

The writer said he or she believes that Katz is an equivalent of Oskar Schindler — "Shitler" — in the sense that the mayor "wastes government money to build a useless bureaucracy to employ his friends and conduct shady land deals while awarding untendered contracts to business associates instead of putting them through a competitive tendering process.

"The Winnipeg Free Press reports that the Winnipeg police major crimes unit is tracking me via the website Topix. Topix co-operates with law enforcement agencies. If they recognize a blatant hate crime, they will give you my IP — I am unclocked," the writer said. "Clearly, no such crime took place here. I criticized people for their actions, not because of who they are or what group they may belong to. This was a last resort after years of writing letters to government officials and getting little or no response."

The writer also praised Jewish Post & News publisher/editor Bernie Bellan and occasional columnist Marty Gold for their "unbiased commentary" in questioning the progress of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights and the new institution's ever-growing need for more funding.

The first round of flyers alleged that since Katz was elected in 2004, "hundreds of millions of dollars have been funnelled from city hall into the pockets of [certain individuals] through untendered contracts and shady land deals"

Most, but not all, the names on the list are Jewish. The Asper Family and Arni Thorsteinson (who is not Jewish) appear on the list, possibly because they have been heavily involved with building the human rights museum, which is under construction here and slated to open in 2014. Most of the other names on the list are involved in property development.

The flyer goes on to read that "the gross misconduct of the mayor's office and city hall has gone on for too long. Firegate is the final straw that will break their backs.

"When the harsh light of scrutiny of the auditor general and the RCMP are turned towards city hall, Sam Katz will be facing hard time... and his cabal of cockroaches will be ditching their dirty money and running for cover."

The references are to a recent controversy swirling around Katz and city hall related to some questionable land deals.

"Firegate" refers to an exchange of three pieces of city-owned land for one larger plot of land owned by a major Jewish developer who is also a close friend of the mayor.

Two of the city-owned parcels of land were occupied by mothballed fire stations, and a new, larger fire station is slated to be built on the new plot of land.

The controversy stems from the land swap being initiated by a deputy fire chief. Most city councillors were unaware of the land deal beforehand and are questioning how a deputy fire chief could make such a deal without council's knowledge or approval.

The explanation has been that deals under $5 million don't need to be vetted by council. But while the original deal involving all three parcels of city-owned land was valued at about $15 million, the parcels were later broken up and sold in three separate deals. The matter is being investigated.

In a statement in response to the first set of posters, Katz expressed his "extreme sadness" that an individual, or individuals, posted such material.

The Winnipeg police hate crimes unit continues to look into the matter.

Former native leader seeks Iran's support

WINNIPEG — Terry Nelson has a knack for generating outrageous headlines.

In 2005, for example, the now former chief of the Roseau River First Nation in southern Manitoba publicly defended disgraced former Saskatchewan Aboriginal leader David Ahenakew, who was charged with making antisemitic statements. Nelson's latest stirring of the pot was his visit to Iran earlier this month, along with Dennis Pashe, another former Manitoba chief. Nelson and Pashe were in Iran to solicit Iranian help in their campaign against what they call the government of Canada's "human rights abuses against aboriginal people."

Orthodox congregation marks 100th anniversary

Abigail Cukier
Special to The C/JN

HAMILTON — One day in the late 1950s, a 24-year-old rabbi entered the Royal Bank of Canada. He sat down in a large chair to ask the manager for a loan of $500,000. The city's Adas Israel Congregation needed the funds to build a new Orthodox synagogue.

When the manager asked what kind of synagogue they would be building, Rabbi Mordechai Green hesitated. At that time, will include the passing of a sefer Torah from one of the founding members to a child. The grandson of the general store owner in Timmins will also be attending. Rabbi Green stressed that the event is free and not a fundraiser. Organizers are hoping current and former members, as well as members of the community will attend the rededication ceremony, including children.

"We want people to appreciate a sense of history and recognize what the generation before them accomplished," Rabbi Green said.

In 1912, a handful of Polish immigrants began a minyan in a small home on Caroline Street in downtown Hamilton. In 1918, they moved to a home on Cannon Street. By 1929, the home had been demolished, and the 38 families in the congregation erected a beautiful building, Adas Israel Anshei Polin (later changed to Adas Israel Anshei Sefard), known to most as the Cannon Street Shul.

The synagogue became the heart of the community and many simchahs and other events were held there. But as time passed, the Jewish community began to leave the downtown for the west end of Hamilton. Congregants took on a new goal — to relocate to that area and build a synagogue to accommodate 400 families.

This was an ambitious dream, but the determined families worked hard to fulfil it, along with their new spiritual leader, Rabbi Mordechai Green.

"These were immigrant families who were trying to make it in life. This building was the embodiment of that," Rabbi Daniel Green said.

In 1961, the new synagogue on Cline Avenue South was dedicated with dignitaries and Jewish leaders from around the world.

The shul now serves 375 families and provides education for all ages from 12 months to high school, as well as adult education. Its congregation is active in programs including youth groups, study sessions and workshops.

"It's nice to see the vision of our founders perpetuated here," Rabbi Green said. "With this rededication, we want to create a sense of purpose that can take us forward into the future."

The centennial celebration will take place Oct. 28 at 1 p.m. at Adas Israel Congregation, 125 Cline Ave. S., Hamilton. Everyone is welcome. For information, call 905-528-0039.

nobody was building Orthodox synagogues. Congregations were building Reform synagogues or converting Orthodox ones to Conservative.

After Rabbi Green answered, the manager said that when he was a child in Timmins, Ont., his father died leaving his mom with six children. The owner of the local general store said, "As long as I have this store, your children will have food to eat and clothes to wear." The owner, who kept that promise, was an Orthodox Jew.

The bank manager had spent his life wondering how to repay that man. That's why he had asked the question.

"One act of kindness had multiple effects," said Rabbi Daniel Green. Rabbi Mordechai's son, who has been the rabbi of Adas Israel since 2002, in the building his father helped build.

Rabbi Mordechai Green served as rabbi from 1958 to 2002 and is now rabbi emeritus. He, his son, Daniel, and current and former members of Adas Israel will celebrate the congregation's 100th anniversary on Oct. 28.

Rabbi Daniel Green said the ceremony

Muslim considers himself a Zionist

Joel Jacobson

Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Kasim Hafeez was prepared for the reaction he received at a Halifax university last week.

At the start of a two-week, cross-Canada speaking tour, the 28-year-old admissions adviser at a university in Britain spoke to about 150 people at an open event at Saint Mary's University, hosted by the Atlantic Jewish Council and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). He also spoke in Toronto on Oct. 21.

A British Muslim of Pakistani origin, Hafeez grew up surrounded by anti-semitic and anti-Israel views, but his thinking has taken a total U-turn, and he now has respect and admiration for what Israel represents and considers himself a Zionist.

Late in the Halifax session, and through a tumultuous question period, some audience members catcalled and disrupted Hafeez's talk. In an interview earlier that day, Hafeez told The C/N, "I see anger and hatred [when I speak publicly] because I'm talking pro-Israel. These radicals see it as not good for them or their community. Sadly, I expect this, and all I can do is have my argument ready to be backed up and hope they see common sense."

Mark David, Atlantic Canada representative of CIJA, was particularly upset at the reaction of the few radicals.

"I was extremely disappointed that Kasim's moving message of peace and tolerance was marred by an unruly anti-Israel segment of the audience. A public lecture held on a Canadian university campus should facilitate the free and open expression of ideas, rather than censorship by mob rule."

However, as he told his story, Hafeez did get his message through to the majority. His father, from whom he is now estranged, often praised Hitler's extermination of the Jews and influenced young Hafeez to drift toward radical Islamist groups. He was further radicalized at university, harbouring an intense hatred for Israel and Jews. He attended many anti-Israel rallies calling for the destruction of the Jewish state.

The starting point of his re-thinking occurred when he read Alan Dershowitz's book, The Case for Israel.

"It was my first exposure to anything remotely supportive of Israel. I bought the book thinking Israel had no case. But there were certain facts I'd never encountered such as that there was a Jewish presence in the Holy Land forever. I had never heard that. The book debunked many myths I had believed to be truths."

He studied more material, did more research, and, by 2007, wanted to see Israel for himself. He arrived at Ben-Gurion Airport, and "being in the wrong demographic, a Muslim male from Europe, I was detained for eight hours. I realized the security person was doing his job and I appreciated that. He was keeping everyone safe."

He also saw an Israel he did not expect, he said. "I saw a modern state. I went to the Western Wall, unsure what to do, whether to pray or what, and I put my forehead on the Wall. I had a eureka moment. Here I was, in the capital of the Jewish state, with synagogues, mosques and churches, people of all religions, and I realized there were six million who will never get to this point. But it was a free state, with Arabs free to move about, with no hatred, even none toward me as I identified myself as a Muslim."

Since then, he knew he had to speak out. He became active in organizations that support Israel, even though people then, and now, wonder if he has ulterior motives, which he stresses he doesn't.

"I want to tell people they will gain nothing from hatred. Hatred for Israel won't bring peace closer. You need to find a middle ground, create dialogue that's better than boycotts and hostility."

Hafeez currently runs www.theisrael-campaign.org, where he maintains a blog.

Winnipegger's satirical protest scoring on YouTube

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG—Adi Sara Kreindler said she has had more than 5,000 hits on her YouTube video that satirizes Canadian Immigration Minister Jason Kenney and the government's decision earlier this year to cut some health-care benefits for refugees.

As of June 30, the federal government stopped providing prescription drugs, prosthetics, eye and vision care to some refugees.

"I did a Fringe [theatre] show a few years back and I perform occasionally at coffee houses, but I have never had an audience of this size," said Kreindler, a Winnipeg Regional Health Authority health-policy analyst who is also a songwriter.

"When I first heard about the cuts to refugee health care, I thought the policy was mean-spirited and potentially harmful to a vulnerable group of people," said Kreindler, who is also a former Rhodes Scholar. "Not that long ago, we were the refugees, many of whom were being denied entry to Canada. This decision by the government speaks to the core of our Jewish and human values."

Her impetus to protest was further fuelled by Kenney, who sent a thank-you note about the funding cut to his own website. Kreindler decided that she could do a better job of "thanking" Kenney.

Thank You, Jason Kenney, a 2-1/2-minute video, contrasts needy refugees with prosperous Canadians. To make the video, she assembled a troupe of family and friends called Just Theatre, and her mother, Reena, prepared the slide show that illustrates the song Kreindler wrote.

In response to the video, Kenney spokeswoman Alexis

Songwriter Adi Sara Kreindler

Pavlich issued a statement. "The sensible changes we made to the IFH [Interim Federal Health] Program are widely supported by Canadians," it said. "The changes ensure that bona fide refugees continue to receive comprehensive health coverage."

The statement goes on to say that the ministry is making sure "illegal immigrants and rejected asylum claimants... no longer receive gold-plated health-care benefits that are more generous than those which Canadian taxpayers, including seniors, receive."

Kreindler said she felt the subject needed a light touch. "If it's funny, some people are likely to be more motivated to click on it and become aware of the issues."

Thank you, Jason Kenney is the second politically inspired YouTube video that Kreindler wrote and produced this year. In the spring, she satirized the government's proposal to raise the age that people can receive Old Age Security from 65 to 67.

As for an encore performance from Kreindler, that will depend on what else the government might do "to tick her off."

To see the video, visit YouTube and search for Thank You, Jason Kenney.

Kilimanjaro climb aids Mount Sinai

Toronto team helps to rescue lost child

Summit for Sinai team climbed Mt. Kilimanjaro in support of Mount Sinai Hospital. While there they rescued a lost child, inset.

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

When Zak Goldman joined a team that climbed Mount Kilimanjaro in Tanzania last month in support of Mount Sinai Hospital, he witnessed first hand the doctors' lifesaving skills.

As the team of 14 climbers, including two emergency room physicians – doctors Howard Ovens and Bjorg Borgundvaag – were making their ascent, they found a six-year-old boy wandering alone and lost.

Goldman, 36, an insurance and estate planner, said the boy actually found them, about 20 minutes away from the climbers' campsite.

"I'm not a crier, but when I saw that young boy, my breath was literally taken away. He had been out there for two nights and was wearing flip flops, tattered pants and a shirt and sweatshirt. [In comparison,] I was wearing fleece pants and a heavy jacket," Goldman said.

"He was holding a miniature rounded knife, because he was sent by his family, who lived at the base of the mountain, to gather grass so they could feed the cows. Somehow, he made it up 13,000 feet. This little boy really gave me a new appreciation for poverty."

The doctors examined the boy for signs of frostbite and starvation, wrapped him in sleeping bags and gave him some hot tea. Then park rangers took him down. "I don't know what would have happened to him if he would have had to spend another night out there."

Goldman, who spent his birthday on the mountain, said that the whole trip was an emotional one for him.

"My wife gave birth to twins at Mount Sinai in 2009. One died, and the other was cared for at the hospital. It has a very special place in my heart. When I was approached to join the team [headed by businessman and Mount Sinai Foundation board member David Cynamon], I couldn't refuse. I made the climb in honour of my three-year-old, Blake, and in memory his twin, Avery."

The climbers raised more than $1.3 million for the hospital, and each decided where they wanted their money to go, said Goldman, including the Avery Goldman Special Fund for the neonatal intensive care unit, the thyroid cancer initiative, cancer research, the Schwartz-Reisman Emergency Centre, women's and infants health, the neonatal intensive care unit, and diabetes research.

"This climb was one of the most rewarding experiences I have ever had, but it was a real commitment. We left our families and our jobs, and it wasn't easy. We slept in tents and shlepped our bags. It was for a great reason, though. The hospital does wonderful things. Look what it did for my son."

He said that he has raised $370,000 for the Avery Goldman fund, including $87,000 from the climb. "I would do it again in a second. What we did [for the hospital] was amazing, and find that little boy was something else altogether."

They went up as a team, and came down as a team, Goldman said. "These were guys I didn't know 14 days earlier, but we all had the same goal. We all wanted to help Mount Sinai."

Former Mossad chief supports Obama's Iran policy

Ron Friedman and Times of Israel Staff
 The Times of Israel

Former Mossad chief Efraim Halevy spoke out in favour of U.S. President Barack Obama's strategy for coping with Iran through sanctions and diplomacy, while criticizing Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney for taking an extreme position.

"The goal of economic sanctions is to convince Iran's leaders to abandon their nuclear drive, not to prepare the ground for a military strike," Halevy said in an interview with Israel Radio Monday morning.

Halevy said if it wasn't for Obama's "brave" strategy, Tehran would not now be facing a severe economic crisis. He added that engaging in negotiations with Iran doesn't mean putting aside sanctions.

The former head of Israel's spy agency criticized Romney's policy on Iran, arguing that the Republican challenger's refusal to hold talks with Tehran leaves no room for any options other than a military strike.

The candidates' strategies for thwarting Iran's nuclear drive were expected to take centre stage in the third presidential debate last Monday in Boca Raton, Fla., which was dedicated to foreign policy.

On Sunday, Halevy said in an interview with the website Al-Monitor that Israel and the United States must engage in a dialogue with Iran to understand how their adversaries think.

"In order to be effective with one's enemies, you have to have two essential capabilities: To overcome them by force if necessary... and do everything you can to get into their minds and try to understand how they see things... and where, if at all, there is room for common ground of one kind or another," Halevy said. "I think that what we have had over the years is an abundance of one side and a dearth of the other."

Halevy made his comments following the Saturday publication of a New York Times report that claimed Iran had agreed to hold direct talks with the United States over its uranium enrichment program, following the U.S. elections. The report has since been denied by both the White House and Tehran.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Sunday denied knowledge of the agreement.

"I have no information about such contacts and I cannot say whether there is truth in the report," the prime minister said. "I can say, though, that Iran has used negotiations [before] to buy time with America."

Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman told Army Radio Sunday that he preferred to believe the White House denial of the report rather than the report itself.

"I want to believe the White House denial, and I want to believe that they learn from experience," Lieberman said. "All the Iranians want to achieve through direct negotiations is the removal of sanctions."

However, Strategic Affairs Minister Moshe Ya'alon told Israel Radio that Jerusalem has known for some time of behind-the-scenes contact between the United States and Iran, and that it has no objections. Ya'alon said direct talks would receive Israel's blessing if they bring an end to Iran's nuclear program.

Abbas erases borders

PA President Mahmoud Abbas – outlining his plans to ask the United Nations for recognition of “Palestine” as a non-member state – virtually redrew the borders of Israel by posting on Facebook that the state he would request from the UN includes “all the territories that Israel occupied before June 1967,” the Israeli newspaper Ma'ariv reported Oct. 17. Abbas' official Facebook page said that such UN recognition “won't liberate the land the day after, but it will prove our right according to which our land is occupied [by Israel] and not disputed.”

State to appeal acquittals

Israel's state prosecutor will appeal the acquittals of former prime minister Ehud Olmert in two of three cases decided earlier this year. The prosecutor informed Olmert's attorney last week that it will appeal the July acquittals on charges of fraud, breach of trust, tax evasion and falsifying corporate records in what became known as the Talansky and Rishon Tours affairs, according to the Justice Ministry. His sentence in the Investment Center Affair, in which the Jerusalem District Court found Olmert guilty on the lesser charge of breach of trust, will also be appealed.

Largest ever military exercise

Israeli and U.S. troops began their largest-ever joint aerial defence exercise on Sunday. It's designed to increase military cooperation between the United States and Israel. The exercise will last three weeks and involve more than 3,500 American service personnel and 1,000 Israeli soldiers. Part of it reportedly will involve live fire. U.S. Air Force Lt.-Gen. Craig Franklin said the exercise is the largest U.S.-Israel military exercise to date, American Forces Press Service reported.

Reform leaders seek probe of Israeli colleague's arrest

JTA

WASHINGTON — Reform Jewish leaders are calling for an investigation following reports that an Israeli colleague was roughed up by police after leading a women's prayer group at the Western Wall.

Reform leaders in the United States said Oct. 18 that they have spoken with Israel's ambassador in Washington, Michael Oren, about the incident involving Anat Hoffman, executive director of the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Center and chair of the Women of the Wall.

Hoffman on the night of Oct. 16 was leading a service with more than 200 women marking the start of the Hebrew month of Cheshvan and celebrating the 100th anniversary of Hadassah, which is holding its convention in Jerusalem.

She told reporters that as she began singing the Shema prayer, police told her that if she did not stop, she would be arrested. When she failed to halt, Hoffman said she was handcuffed and taken into custody for wearing a tallit and disturbing public order.

At the police station, she told the Forward, “They checked me naked, completely without my underwear. They dragged me on the floor 15 metres. My arms are bruised.” Hoffman added that she was put in, said Hoffman's treatment “is deplorable and degrading.” He called on Israel's police to investigate the matter and “ensure that the right of women to pray at the Wall is protected.”

Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Religious Action Center for Reform Judaism, added that “there is no denominational monopoly on the spirituality” of the Western Wall and “it is intolerable that any woman should be arrested for praying at one of Judaism's most cherished sites.”

Barbara Kavadias, acting executive director of the Association of Reform Zionists of America said: “Anat Hoffman has been arrested for doing what Jewish women all over the world do on a regular basis: pray as Jews.”

In 2003, Israel's Supreme Court upheld a government ban on women wearing tfilin or tallit or reading from a Torah scroll at the Wall. Women of the Wall has held a special prayer service at the Wall's section for women almost each month for the last 20 years on Rosh Chodesh, the beginning of the new Hebrew month.

In August, Jerusalem police arrested four women at the Wall for “behaviour that endangers the public peace” and wearing prayer shawls.

They were forbidden from entering the Western Wall Plaza for the next 50 days, according to the organization. In June, Israeli police detained a woman wearing a tallit at the Wall and later questioned her for four hours after asking her to wear her prayer shawl as a scarf.

Following a court appearance in the early afternoon of Oct. 17, Hoffman was released from custody and issued a restraining order from going to the Wall for 30 days.

Israeli police have not commented on the reports.

Former NDP MP sailed on Gaza-bound ship

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Israeli navy on Saturday rerouted a Gaza-bound ship to the Israeli port of Ashdod after the vessel attempted to break Israel's maritime security blockade.

Masked Israeli soldiers boarded the ship, the Estelle, without the use of force. The operation came after attempts were made to prevent the vessel from reaching the Gaza Strip, both by direct contact and through diplomatic channels, but to no avail, the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) said in a news release.

The IDF found no humanitarian equipment onboard, despite activists' claims that they were delivering needed materials to the Strip.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu praised the IDF for its takeover of the Gaza-bound ship carrying pro-Palestinian activists. He said the Estelle's passengers aimed to provoke and slander Israel.

In a televised statement, the prime minister hailed the military's "efforts in safeguarding the naval blockade of the Gaza Strip in accordance with international law."

Netanyahu said the people on the ship, among them three Israelis, "know that there is no humanitarian crisis in Gaza, and their only goal is to create a provocation and to slander Israel's name."

He added that if human rights were indeed important to the 25 activists on board, they would have sailed to Syria.

The Estelle's passengers and crew included activists and legislators from Greece, Sweden, the United States, Canada, Norway and Israel.

Among them was 79-year-old former New Democratic Party MP Jim Manly. Manly's son, Paul, issued a statement Saturday afternoon saying his father, who is a retired United Church minister, was in Israeli custody.

"While he is in good health for his age, he is not as resilient as he was in his youth and has medication he needs to take daily. I hope that the IDF respect his human rights and legal rights, and treat him with the respect and dignity he deserves," he said.

Ehab Lotayef, a spokesperson for Canadian Boat to Gaza, which helped organize Manly's mission, told the Globe and Mail that Greek and Spanish members of the contingent were released after their governments' ambassadors interceded with Israel.

A spokesperson for Canada's Foreign Affairs department said Canadian consular officials in Tel Aviv and in Ottawa are monitoring the situation closely and have been in contact with Manly.

In Ottawa, Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said, "As with all past flotilla theatrics, this weekend's attempt had nothing to do with humanitarian aid – indeed, according to media reports, there was no humanitarian aid supplies on the vessel. Rather, this was an effort to try to embarrass and by extension delegitimize Israel once again within the international community. Canadians have concluded long ago that such political theatre does nothing to advance peace and indeed does a disservice to the Palestinians the flotilla sponsors claim to be supporting."

"Manly – a former MP best known for boycotting the Meech Lake accord and voting against his caucus, and perhaps not by coincidence, a United Church ordained minister – has a long history of identifying with radical elements on the left."

"Israel has, quite correctly and in accord with international law, detained him as a result of his unlawful attempt to enter Israeli waters, and according to Israeli authorities, he will be deported forthwith," Fogel said.

IDF Chief of the General Staff Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz asked the military prosecutor to explore whether legal action can be taken against the Estelle's passengers.

According to activists, the soldiers boarded the ship while it was still in international waters, some 38 nautical miles from the coast of Gaza.

Victoria Strand, a Stockholm-based spokesperson for the campaign, told Agence France Press (AFP) that the Estelle, a 174-foot (53-metre) schooner, came "under attack" shortly after the Israeli vessels approached it. Dror Feiler, an Israeli activist aboard the ship, was quoted by AFP as saying the ship was "attacked at 10:15 a.m." on Saturday.

Some reports had the Estelle carrying two olive trees as well as 41 tons of cement, toys, medical equipment and books. The IDF said, "Any organization or state who wishes to transfer supplies or aid to the Gaza Strip can do so via the existing land crossings and in co-ordination with Israeli authorities."

Israel maintains that an air and sea blockade of Gaza, in place since 2007, is necessary in order to obstruct the flow of weapons to Hamas.

Under heavy international pressure, Israel eased the blockade in 2010 after an Israeli naval raid killed nine Turkish activists aboard the Mavi Marmara, a Gaza-bound ship.

Fundraiser highlights Technion's hockey-training project

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

The young professionals who launched the Canadian Technion Society's Generation Next division at Toronto's Hockey Hall of Fame didn't just plan a party: they hoped to partake in a breakthrough technology that would turn sound waves into electricity.

Funds raised from the official launch party on Oct. 16, along with an online social-media fundraising campaign, will support Technion-Israel Institute of Technology's Prof. Yehuda Argnon's project to build a prototype of a low-cost device that could transform sound waves into electricity.

"You could say that Generation Next is giving you the chance to participate in history," said Neal Clossner, speaking to a packed room of about 200 people. "We together will all build [it]."

Established in 1943, the Canadian Technion Society (CTS) promotes and funds Technion, known for its groundbreaking discoveries in the fields of medicine, biotechnology, nanotechnology and science.

But the 69-year-old organization didn't know how much longer it could last if it didn't interest the younger generation.

"When I came in, hardly any young people were involved in the organization," said Hershel Recht, national development director of the CTS. "What we needed to do was to find a way to bring young people interested in high tech and technology to make sure the Technion name survives in Canada."

His father was once the national president of the CTS many years ago, and Hecht said he "endowed in me the importance of the Technion my entire life."

But Hecht and his team at Generation Next aren't looking for just anyone – they want young professionals who are seriously interested in supporting high-technology engineering and medical innovations, and will become the CTS's future board. "That's what we need, and what we hope to do even more this year," said Hecht.

To showcase the Technion's innovative capabilities first-hand, the event demonstrated one of its newest developments, the Hockey IntelliGym, a computerized training program that simulates real hockey games using applied cognitive engineering technology to literally develop new instincts. It trains athletes' minds to react quickly and intuitively to every action on the ice, with the goal of developing a new "hockey sense." Players who used the software saw a 30 per cent increase in performance.

The technology was originally developed to train air force pilots to react to flight challenges and minimize life-threatening aerial damages. There was a 30 per cent improvement in flight performance in air force pilots that used the software for only 10 hours.

"It's a workout gym for the mind," said Scott Woodrow, a CTS board member. "It improves game but also avoids injury." And since the Hockey IntelliGym was the sponsor of the event, it was only natural to have it take place at Toronto's Hockey Hall of Fame.

As the young professionals mingled with the CTS board members and staff, a video played on screens around the room, highlighting the Technion's history over the last 100 years: its founding in 1912, to Israel's first Nobel Prize in science won by Technion alumni Aaron Clechanover in 2004, to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's visit to the school in March 2012, when he said not to just give money to the Technion, but to "invest money in the Technion."

In fact, the Technion's achievements hit close to home, too. "The next time you gaze at your iPhone, consider the Technion did in fact help create this. The next time you ponder the security of the western world, consider the Technion is playing a role in its defence. And the next time your favourite NHL team is struggling for a playoff spot... the Technion did develop a solution," said Woodrow.

The CTS Generation Next has already been planning for their next event, a mission to Israel at the end of November, where participants will tour the Technion, and get an inside look at Israel's high-tech sector.

"We cannot keep relying on the old generation," said Recht. "They're very, very important, but they've told us as well, go out and get new people and that's what were doing."

Israeli invents cardboard bike

JNS.org

An Israel inventor has created a bicycle made nearly entirely out of cardboard as well as a new model of "green" transportation production that could allow poor nations to get bicycles free.

The bicycle created by cyclist and entrepreneur Izhar Gafni, 50, is made out of cardboard but is treated with an organic substance that makes it water and fire proof, and is then coated with lacquer paint. The device will have no metal parts, and even the brakes, wheels and pedal will be made from green materials.

"This is a real game-changer. It changes the way products are manufactured and shipped, it causes factories to be built everywhere instead of moving production to cheaper labour markets. Everything that we have known in the production world can change," said Nimrod Elmish, Gafni's business partner, according to Reuters.

The cardboard bikes would be produced on automated production lines that would be supplemented primarily by pensioners and the disabled. While the bicycles will be given away, the entrepreneur neers intend to make a profit by selling ads.

"Because you get a lot of government grants, it brings down the production costs to zero, so the bicycles can be given away for free. We are copying a business model from the high-tech world where software is distributed free because it includes embedded advertising," Elmish said.

Murder mystery set in Warsaw Ghetto rings hollow

Richard Zimler's recent novel, The Warsaw Anagrams (Overlook Press), reveals important tendencies and challenges in Holocaust writing today. Zimler is a popular novelist and a good one, having made his mark with a book called The Last Kabbalist of Lisbon. Setting a kind of template for his work, that novel chose another period of historical catastrophe – the early 16th century, following the inquisition in Spain and Portugal – as the backdrop for the kind of book beloved of many readers: the crime procedural. In both novels, Zimler tells the story of a single murder, against the backdrop of mass dislocation and death, from the point of view of an informal detective.

In The Warsaw Anagrams the stakes are higher than in his previous work, for it is set in the Warsaw Ghetto. Like its predecessor, it has elements that might be called fantastic, but it is a realistic novel about the war years told from the perspective of Erik Cohen, a sensitive psychiatrist who, upon arriving in the Ghetto, moves in with his niece and her young son.

Like other popular works of fiction about the war, The Warsaw Anagrams draws some of its power and its readers' sympathy from its portrayal of children's lives in the Ghetto. Zimler's Ghetto is one where the adults, many broken, some cynical, others given over to corruption, are overshadowed by the presence of children who maintain an uncanny vitality and adventurousness. The most moving of such portraits is that of Adam, Cohen's niece's son, and it is Adam's fate that sends Cohen in search of clues, evidence and an ultimate truth about the violence done to children under the shadow of Nazi oppression.

The Warsaw Anagrams offers a convincingly grey and atmospheric Ghetto, reminiscent of presentations found in actual memoirs of its enclosed streets and tenements. Some of what Zimler creates is reminiscent of Michal Glowinski's wonderful and grim The Black Seasons, which muses about the colour of the Ghetto, its lack of light, and the absence of green growing things, from a child's point of view.

Zimler has clearly done his share of historical research. He acknowledges Emanuel Ringelblum's Notes from the Warsaw Ghetto, and his debt to Ringelblum goes as far as reiterating some of the Ghetto archivist's responses, including the notion that Jews under the German occupation had been flung back to the Middle Ages in their wartime statelessness and incarceration. Warsaw streets, pitiful shops, the interior of distressed buildings, the clothes, diet and health of increasingly desperate people are all conveyed with care and detail. And because Zimler is not a conventional historical novelist, but a more literary and inventive worker in words, these things are conveyed in glancing ingenious ways.

Still, the experience of reading The Warsaw Anagrams brings with it an inkling that something is not quite right in the world of Holocaust fiction. The outset of the book focuses on Cohen's movement into the Ghetto, the collapse of normality in his life, and the relationship between himself, his niece and her child, to whom he becomes dedicated. Zimler handles this territory well, using light humour and the hard facts of daily life to bring across character. Adam convinces his mother and Cohen that he should be allowed to bring home a bird – something even more vulnerable than he is – as a pet. The presence of the bird, which turns out to be a kind of invalid, evokes the challenges among the Ghetto inhabitants to protect and care for their most vulnerable compatriots.

But following the murder that transforms Cohen and his life in the Ghetto, the novel becomes something different – a more conventionally plotted crime story. This generic turn is a disappointment. The immediacy and specificity of the book gives way to familiar interrogations of the kind one might find in Edgar Allan Poe, Raymond Chandler, or, more depressingly, on television police dramas. When Zimler addresses this part of his narrative his language – which is otherwise textured and moving – goes slack. The appearance of such narrative strategies in an otherwise serious presentation of the Holocaust may not bother all readers. It may, judging from the success of Zimler's books, please some. But I found the sudden appearance of a genre familiar from other media and types of books intrusive and strange. The seriousness, even loveliness of other parts of The Warsaw Anagrams seemed to fall away in favour of something predictable, even sensational.

In what way does the hybrid character of Zimler's novel suggest the state of the art in Holocaust fiction? Zimler is a writer up to his task; he treats his material with sensitivity, seriousness and personal commitment. In interviews, and in the book itself, he highlights the need to tell particular stories in order to tease meaning out of the overwhelming number of the dead, so difficult to portray convincingly in works of art. Yet this ethical demand is undermined – possibly without the author's intention – by the use of long-standing literary patterns that might suit TV drama, and even the sophisticated drawing room narratives of Poe and Conan Doyle, but which ring hollow within the walls of the Warsaw Ghetto.

Norman Ravvin's recent books include a novel, The Joyful Child (Gaspereau Press) and Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein, co-edited with Sherry Simon (McGill-Queen's).

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

AGO exhibit salutes Frida Kahlo, Diego Rivera

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Frida Kahlo (1907-1954) and her husband, Diego Rivera (1886-1957), were probably the most illustrious couple in 20th-century art.

She achieved fame as a painter of mercurial self-portraits that verged on the surreal, while he was a famous muralist who championed Mexico's national identity.

Through their body of work, they offered a new vision of Mexico's rich cultural past and its changing social realities.

Their legacy is explored in Frida & Diego: Passion, Politics in Painting, an Art Gallery of Ontario exhibition running until Jan. 20.

Featuring almost one-quarter of Kahlo's paintings, a selection of Rivera's murals, watercolours, prints and paintings, plus a panoply of photographs in which they appear in various poses, Frida & Diego places their legendary careers in historic perspective.

At a press preview last week, curators hailed Rivera as one of the most influential artists of his time, in a league with Pablo Picasso and Henri Matisse, while Kahlo was described as an icon of the modern-art movement.

Frida Kahlo's self portrait.

They met in 1928 when he was already an international figure and she was a novice painter. Although they had a stormy marriage, shattered by multiple affairs, their left-wing political convictions and commitment to their art made them lifelong companions and partners.

Kahlo, said to be of partial Jewish ancestry, was born in a town near Mexico City. Her mother, Matilde Calderon y Gonzalez, was of Spanish and Indian origin. Her father, Carl Wilhelm (Guillermo), a photographer, was born in Germany, supposedly the scion of Hungarian Jewish immigrants.

Some researchers claim that her father was from a long line of Protestants, and that Kahlo identified him as a Jew so that she could disassociate herself from the crimes of Nazi Germany.

Her father's faith notwithstanding, Kahlo's identity was formed and fixed by politics rather than by religion.

Like her husband, she was an ardent Communist. Indeed, she played a role in bringing Leon Trotsky, fleeing the wrath of Stalinism, to Mexico.

Suffering from endemic health problems after a catastrophic bus accident at the age of 18, Kahlo abandoned her medical studies and immersed herself in painting. Her husband, recognizing a raw talent, encouraged her.

Kahlo was drawn to self-portraits, as the exhibition manifestly reveals, because her almost fatal accident temporarily rendered her immobile. As she said, "I paint myself because I am so often alone and because I am the subject I know best."

Among the vibrant self-portraits on display at the AGO are Self-Portrait with Necklace (1933), Self-Portrait Sitting on a Bed (1933), Self-Portrait with Red and Gold Dress (1941), A Few Small Nips (1935) and Self-Portrait with Monkeys (1943).

These paintings, influenced in part by Mexican folk painting, reveal Kahlo's broken body, her miscarriages, her mixed European and indigenous heritage, her love of animals and her fraught relationship with Rivera.

Rivera's artistry unfolds through such paintings as The Bullfighter and Cabbage Seller and through an enormous and visually arresting mural commissioned by Mexico's ministry of education, one of more than 200 murals he painted in a lifetime.

The photographs, largely taken by Nickolas Murray (her lover in the 1930s) and Bernard Silberman in both black and white and colour, portray Kahlo and Rivera alone or together. Although compelling, they seem staged, theatrical and even pretentious.

One of the strongest photographs, introducing the exhibition, shows a delicate Kahlo leaning her head against the hefty Rivera's shoulder.

Polish film explores a well-kept secret

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The fourth annual Ekran Polish Film Festival in Toronto, which runs Oct. 25-28, is presenting a movie that will be of special interest to Jewish viewers.

The Secret, written and directed by Przemyslaw Wojcieszek, churns up bitter memories of the fate Polish Jews suffered in Poland during World War II.

This 82-minute feature film, scheduled to be screened on Oct. 27 at 9 p.m. at the Revue Cinema (400 Roncesvalles Ave.), can probably be best described as a psychological drama.

Spare in style, The Secret takes place in contemporary Poland, but focuses on a period just before the close of the war, when the country was in a chaotic, even anarchic, state.

The movie opens in rural Poland as Ksawery (Tomasz Tyndyk), a gay cabaret performer, pays a visit to his grandfather, Jan (Marek Kepinski). He is accompanied by his taciturn agent, Karolina (Agnieszka Podsiadlik).

Ksawery is there to confront Jan. Karolina has discovered that Jan, to whom Ksawery is very close, may have murdered a Jewish man and his son during the waning months of the war and appropriated his property.

The Polish American historian Jan Gross has dealt with this incendiary theme in two controversial books, Fear - Antisemitism in Poland after Auschwitz and Golden Harvest, both of which have aroused nation-wide debates about Poland's relationship with its Jewish citizens before, during and after the Holocaust.

Taking his cue from Gross, perhaps, Wojcieszek shapes The Secret into a film about the power and endurance of memory.

In keeping with its subliminally Jewish plot, each segment is introduced by Hebrew-language titles, an original way of creating atmosphere.

The Secret comes to a head when Jan, denying his complicity in the murder of a Jewish man and his nine-year-old son, claims a right-wing guerrilla band may have killed them.

Revising his story under the pressure of further questions, Jan claims that the father and son immigrated to Palestine. He also acknowledges that the house he lives in now may have belonged to them.

To prove his innocence, he produces a notebook in Yiddish that the Jewish man left behind. For Karolina, who has taught herself to read Yiddish, "the language of the dead," the notebook is evidence of Jan's guilt. But for Ksawery, who loves his grandfather, the issue is not so clear.

Wisely, the director lets the viewer decide.

Minor leaguers play as NHL lockout lingers

Harvey Rosen
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Unless you've been on an interplanetary space flight, you're well aware of the angst being experienced by National Hockey League fans who need a shiny fix in the worst way.

The best I can offer is an accounting of the whereabouts of the Jewish players who are still pursuing their lifelong dream as NHL draftees and are now honing their game in junior or minor-pro ranks, not to mention those in their late 20s or early 30s who won't let go and are earning a few dollars in pro leagues in Germany, Austria, England, Switzerland and elsewhere.

Consider, for instance, never-say-die goaltender Dov Grumet-Morris, now 30. The Harvard University grad, who was a fifth-round draft pick by Philadelphia in 2002, has appeared in more than 260 minor league games with 14 different teams in five different countries.

He's paid his dues all right, but don't tell him he hasn't got a shot. Last year in with the San Antonio Rampage, the Florida Panthers' AHL farm team, he got into 34 games and boasted a goals against average (GAA) of 2.33, a save percentage of .921, with a won-lost mark of 19-13-1. He was credited with getting the Rampage into the playoffs. The Panthers recently signed the personable Grumet-Morris, whose wife, Rachel, is a surgeon in Houston, to a two-way deal.

Then there's Winnipeg's Jacob Micflikier, 28, who played last season with the Washington Capitals' top farm team, the Hershey Bears. The former college star at the University of New Hampshire is a left-handed shooting forward. In only 57 games last year, he potted 21 goals and added 35 assists.

The previous year, the 5-8, 180-pounder played with the AHL's Charlotte Checkers and had 29 goals and 32 assists in 78 games. This season, he's taken his game to Biel of the Swiss-A league, where in eight games, he's scored three goals and added three helpers. Micflikier reportedly sees the move to Europe as a way to jump-start his NHL aspirations.

Another Winnipegger, Brendan Leipsic, a 5-9, 175-pound forward, is free of the lockout and is playing in the Western Hockey League with the Portland Winterhawks.

Last summer in the NHL Entry Draft, the Nashville Predators took the fast-skating, hard-hitting forward in the third round, 89th overall. The 18-year-old son of mother Kathleen, a gymnast who represented Canada at the Los Angeles Olympics in 1984, and dad Greg, a high school running back in the mid-1980s, scored 28 goals and earned 30 assists in 65 games. He doubtless impressed the scouts with his strong two-way game while recording a plus-16, demonstrating hard work at both ends of the ice. Thus far, Brendan has scored three goals and added three assists in nine games.

The only other Jewish player taken in last year's NHL entry draft was netminder Daniel Altschuler, who's in his second straight year with the Oshawa Generals of the Ontario Hockey League. The Carolina Hurricanes took the 18-year-old in the third round at 69th overall. He fills a lot of net at close to 6-4 and 201 pounds. The Nepean, Ont.-native played in 30 games last year and for junior hockey had a respectable GAA of 3.22 and a save percentage of .900. So far in his second campaign in Oshawa, he has a 7-1 record and a 2.74 GAA to go with a .909 save percentage.

Jewish defenceman Jonathon Blum, 23, will have a place to play with the AHL Milwaukee Admirals, the Predators' No. 1 farm team. The former Vancouver Giant of the Western Hockey League was selected by Nashville in the first round (23rd overall) in the 2007 NHL entry draft.

While he has played in 182 games with the Admirals since the 2008-09 season, the California-born skater, who is 6-1 and 190 pounds has played 56 games in the NHL and scored six goals along with nine assists. Primarily an offensive defenceman in junior, the parent club wants him to work on his defensive play. In the plus-minus department last season he was -14 in the NHL (33 games) and -11 (48 games) at Milwaukee.

In mid-September, Nashville signed Blum, a restricted free agent, to a one-year two-way deal. If he sticks in the NHL, he'll be paid $650,000, and in Milwaukee he would earn $105,000. The contract also guarantees that if he remains in the AHL all season, he'll get $300,000.

Ethan Werek, a 200-pound, 6-2 centre

from Markham, Ont., will be back with the AHL's Portland Pirates. Originally drafted by the Rangers in the second round, 47th overall, in 2009, the 21-year-old was traded in May 2011 to the Coyotes for Oscar Lindberg.

The one-time Kingston Frontenac of the OHL — and an all-star at the junior level as well as a winner of a gold medal in the world under-17 challenge in 2008 — scored 10 goals and added nine assists in 69 games with the Pirates last winter. There are a few other veteran Jewish players still trying to eke out a living overseas.

Centre Cory Pecker, 31, a sixth-round pick of the Flames in the 1999 NHL entry draft, is playing in the English League with the Sheffield Steelers. Since 2007-08, he has been playing primarily overseas in the Swiss-B league.

Former Barrie Colts' star right-winger Michael Heinrich, 32, a first-round draft pick at No. 13 by the Edmonton Oilers in 1998, hasn't played in North America since he went to Europe after the 2005-06 season. The Thornhill, Ont., skater never made it to the NHL with Edmonton, but he did play 219 AHL games. He's now playing with Dornbush in Austria after playing mostly in Germany and Italy.

Lastly, goalie Josh Tordjman, 27, has taken his act to Asiago of the Italian league. The Montreal puck stopper played 176 games in the AHL with San Antonio and got into a pair of NHL games with the Coyotes. In seven games with Asiago, Tordjman has a 3.22 goals against average and a save percentage of .900.

Volunteer helped build a soccer field in Gondar

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

When Tal Cantor spent three months in Gondar, Ethiopia, this summer, it changed her life.

"Working in a clinic where illness is concentrated, sickness is in your face, it's a very extreme experience," she said.

Cantor volunteered at the Mother Teresa Clinic, which treats people who are gravely ill. Although she has volunteered at hospitals in Montreal, she said she wasn't prepared for what she would see on her first tour of the hospital. As soon as she reached the children's ward, she cried.

"You see how physically disabled they were," she said. "If they were somewhere more privileged, it would have never gotten to that point. They would be in a better physical shape, better emotional shape."

It was the Jewish Agency's Project Tikkun Empowerment Network (TEN) that brought Cantor to Gondar. This new program takes people aged 20 to 30, and brings them to impoverished countries to volunteer in the communities.

Although Cantor had never been to Africa, her father has been involved in McGill University environmental-science major. "You learn a lot in school but when you get a first-hand experience, it enriches your education even more."

When the group arrived, they were given several options of how they would contribute to the society. After seeing the sick children, Cantor knew that's where she wanted to be.

She said that initially her attitude toward the clinic was negative. She wondered why the people there were not getting the proper care they so desperately needed. But as she experienced life in Gondar, and particularly in the hospital, that all changed.

Everybody in the hospital helped one another, and did the best they could, she said. "That place wasn't a bad place to be. It was a great place to be."

Despite being so far away from home, Cantor found the Jewish community in Gondar to be rather familiar to her.

"They're taught Hebrew and the prayers," she said, adding that it's pretty much just like any other Jewish school, and the city even has its own community centre. "They aren't any different than we are. They just live in a different country."

Still, she described it as a bit of a culture shock to hear the little kids speaking Hebrew.

Another moment of culture shock came when she was distributing food from the U.S. Agency for International Development. Typically, this agency brings food to Gondar twice monthly.

She said she remembers seeing a delivery of soy-enriched flour. A little boy came up to the flour station, put his hand in, and just ate it.

"That's overwhelming in itself," she said. "You see people who don't have the options we have. They're literally dependent on others to get a meal. You see people leaving with bags of food, and you don't know how long they're traveling with those bags on their back."

This sight changed her view of western society.

"I remember one woman carrying the bag on her head. And here [in Canada], people complain that their knapsacks are too heavy. How can they even say that?" she said. "These are people who are blind, and these are people who are crippled. Their hope is to survive the day, and their hope is to feed their families."

Cantor left her mark on the community through the building of a sustainable soccer field. Its sustainability means it was built using recycled materials, and nothing was cut down in order to build it.

"It is important to be culturally humble and to use materials that they have around their surrounding environment," she said. Therefore, with the help of a translator, Cantor teamed up with workers from the clinic to build the goal posts out of wood that was lying around the compound.

She created and designed the goal posts, and a man weaved rope from bags left over from a food-distribution day.

Painting is very helpful for many of the children who have physical and developmental special needs, she said, so one day, once the goal posts were set up, she took the kids out to paint them.

"By painting they were able to make use of the muscles in their fingers, arms and hands, all the while exploring their creative capacities," she said.

"Oftentimes, people come into these clinics from around the world, and they bring electronics and things they think are cool for these people to have," she said. "But you're going into another culture. You're a guest in their world." You can't just bring things in and then leave, taking away these new resources, she added.

Cantor said she recommends the program to everybody. But when they sign up, they should know the Project TEN trip is different from many other volunteer programs in that it's a longer experience in the country.

When people do short trips to Africa to build a school, it doesn't support the community, she said. It creates a society that relies on external sources, waiting for the next group from the western world to drop in and build something else for them.

"It's really easy for someone who doesn't know about the culture to think they're going to be helpful," she said, "but you have to be humble about how to approach situations."

In the end, Cantor, who is studying to become a doctor, said the program changed her life.

"If I have the honour of practising medicine, I want to give back to the Ethiopian culture," she said. "It's such a beautiful culture. The people there are so warm, and they have incredible stories. It was really a privilege to work there."

The family vacation

As the prospect of winter break appears ever so dimly on the distant horizon, my husband and I begin an all-too-familiar conversation about the family vacation. We both relish the idea of a getaway, particularly during the winter school holidays, when life in suburbia becomes ever so quiet and the ubiquitous, mind-numbing Christmas songs reach their shrill zenith.

The tropics beckon with sunshine, golden beaches and a reprieve from everything that makes our life at home chaotically busy. Trouble is, that's where the similarities between our ideas of vacation end abruptly.

After 16 years of marriage, I can read his mind – but I don't have to. As soon as we agree that a vacation might be nice, hubby's thoughts meander to cruise lines and all-inclusive resorts. He pictures long hours on a comfy deck chair by the swimming pool, where his iPad will deliver episode after episode of his favourite miniseries, interrupted only by meals and a dip in the pool.

The kids will spend the day at a kids' club, where we won't have to arbitrate fights or deal with any whining until the evening, at which point they'll hopefully be too exhausted to put up much resistance. And once they're in bed, an on-board casino or resort show will provide some entertainment before we retire – only to repeat the same schedule the next day.

My stomach turns at the prospect of this kind of vacation. "What will my children learn from it?" I wonder, knowing full well the answer is nothing.

For me this is boredom personified, a cookie-cutter holiday designed for the masses. What's more, it defeats the whole purpose of travel, which – to my mind – should be about exploring a destination and its culture, meeting and learning from locals who have different traditions, recipes, customs and lives than we do, and returning home enriched by these experiences.

I head to the library and check out a book on Cambodia, picturing the family exploring Angkor Wat at sunrise, watching pileated gibbons and Asian black bears in Bokor National Park and tasting fish steamed in banana leaf cups at the Old Market in Siem Reap. These would be unforgettable experiences that would teach the whole family about life elsewhere, and in particular, leave my impressionable children with a perspective on how privileged their lives are in Canada.

"It sounds totally impractical and a lot of work," says hubby when I broach the idea. "Why can't we just relax when we go on holiday? Why do we always have to explore?"

We go back and forth for a while. I try to explain that sticking the kids in a kids' club, also known as vacation daycare, is not truly a family holiday. "I can't sit by the swimming pool for more than an hour," I complain. "I need to explore and get beyond the resort – and I want to do it with my family!"

Eventually we reach an impasse and the idea is shelved until December, at which point it's too late to arrange anything. As the Christmas season descends blandly around us, we vow that next year, somehow, we'll find a compromise and take a vacation. But so far, it's eluded us completely, so we simply stay home.

"One glorious chain of love, of giving and receiving unites all creatures." – Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch

It is so difficult to understand the Torah narrative of Creation and the subsequent actions of people that led to great destruction. We read in Bereshit how God created the world and how joyous She was at every step proclaiming, "And it was good" after each day was completed, and saying it twice on the third day.

The world seems to be a global Garden of Eden as the waters separate from the sky and the gardens grow and the insects and animals thrive. Man is created. Woman is sculpted, and the Almighty's work is done. Therein, it seems, is perfection – the flawless globe and bodies in which we live.

But then a beguiling snake weaves its way into the psyche of woman and man, and the first couple is forced to exit God's landscape. Cain and Abel, the original brothers, come to blows. One kills the other. Later, a deluge explodes from the heavens and drowns most of Creation.

So what are we to make of our skillfully designed and incompetently managed world?

It would appear that within the seams of Creation, a destructive force have been destroyed over the past 20 years.

We look even closer and discover that sunsets are more stunning than ever, yet 240 million people between 1900 and 2000, or about 12 per cent of the world's population in 1900 and about four per cent in 2000, were murdered in war.

Knowing this, what are we, creations and co-creators with God, supposed to do?

Perhaps we are supposed to repair. In our day and age, this repairing is called tikkun olam, and it means each of us must strengthen ourselves as Jews and human beings so that we are ensconced in goodness and always aware of the Torah imperative of "veahavta l'reacha kamocha," love thy neighbour like thyself. Knowing that the form is without flaw but that we are the dented cogs that move it along, we have no choice but to fix the Earth, to develop ourselves.

On Nov. 4, Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee once again holds its Starry Nights gala. It will no doubt be a beautiful evening, when we will enjoy Stephen Page's music and celebrate six Tikun Olam Award winners, including Ely Gotz, Dr. Isaac Sobol, Faye Schulman, Dr. Philip Berger, Ellen Schwartz and Adam Hummel. We will commit to emulating their deeds.

On Nov. 4, 700 of us will gather in the Telus Centre for the Performing Arts in recognition of the reality we all need to fix: We need to bang a nail into the new homes of the homeless and pack a Kinder Kit – a backpack with educational material – for the impoverished Jewish and non-Jewish children in Jerusalem and Toronto.

On that night, we will express our gratitude to those who have courageously and with great vigour ensured the strength of the Jewish People and Israel through a commitment to tikkun olam, ve'ahavta and a journey back to the Garden of Eden.

Drabinsky Paroled

TORONTO — Fallen theatre mogul Garth Drabinsky will be able to serve out the rest of his five-year prison sentence for fraud at a Toronto halfway house starting Nov. 11, the Parole Board of Canada ruled last week. The ex-CEO of Livent, known for hit productions such as Phantom of the Opera, was sentenced in 2009, along with partner Myron Gottlieb, for two counts of fraud for cooking the books at Livent, which went bankrupt in 1998. After a series of appeals, Drabinsky, 62, began serving his sentence in September 2011. He made his parole request in a tearful video hearing from Gravenhurst, Ont., north of Toronto, where he's in a minimum security prison. Gottlieb was released on parole last July.

MP Hosts Speakers

TORONTO — York Centre MP Mark Adler is hosting a Nov. 2 Shabbat dinner at Beth Emeth synagogue featuring speakers Slavi Binev, a member of the European Parliament and Bulgarian presidential candidate, and Rev. Majed el Shafie, founder of One Free World International and advocate for Christian rights in Egypt. Both will discuss Jewish issues, while Binev will also speak about last July's attack on a busload of Israeli tourists in his country, and Shafie will discuss the situation in Egypt.

Canadian Sentenced

NEW YORK — A 25-year-old Canadian from Toronto was sentenced to six to 18 years in prison for grand larceny for her part in stealing donor information from UJA-Federation of New York and giving it to members of a 55-person identity-theft ring. Tracey Nelson was arrested and fired in 2011 after she had spent 2-1/2 years stealing the data in her role as a clerk for the federation. In all, $2 million was stolen from 200 individuals and organizations, the New York Daily News reported.

Empire Poultry Fires CEO

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Empire Kosher Poultry Inc. fired its chief executive officer allegedly after the aborted acquisition of another kosher poultry firm.

Greg Rosenbaum learned Oct. 10 that he was out at Empire, America's leading supplier of kosher poultry, the Washington Jewish Week reported. The company, based in Mifflintown, Pa., went from near collapse to prosperity and expansion about a year after Rosenbaum arrived in 2006.

Rosenbaum told the newspaper that he was fired because of a "disagreement between himself and the partners of Empire Kosher on the strategy and direction for the company." The problems began, he said, after the partners vetoed an acquisition deal he had been negotiating since last spring with MVP Kosher Foods, the country's second-largest kosher poultry supplier.

MVP's Mark Honigsfeld said he approached Rosenbaum and that talks took place with the knowledge of both firms' boards. In preparation for the purchase, Honigsfeld said MVP turned over its inventories, birds and customers to Empire. In July, MVP closed its plant, but money never changed hands, and on Oct. 12, he was told that there would be no deal, he said. Empire said it acted in good faith.

Men Attack Boy

PARIS — Two men hit and threatened a Jewish schoolboy at a Paris bus stop, according to the security unit of France's Jewish community, the SPCJ. The two men, both in their 40s, hit the 12-year-old with a belt Oct. 22 and told him to stay silent, the SPCJ said. He was waiting for a bus to school.

The men also insulted the boy in Arabic. The incident, which SPCJ called "an antisemitic act of aggression," happened in northeast Paris. The parents filed a complaint with police and the SPCJ. In the first eight months of 2012, the SPCJ counted 386 "antisemitic acts," up 45 per cent over the same period in 2011, it said in a report this month.

Sanctions won't deter Iran, says Israeli minister

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A nuclear-armed Iran would be a boon to terrorists, a threat to the Middle East and a spur to encourage other countries in the region to develop atomic arsenals, Israeli Minister of Energy and Water Resources Uzi Landau warned on Sunday.

"Iran could provide terrorists with a nuclear umbrella," said Landau, speaking at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Iran's acquisition of a nuclear weapon would also bolster its influence in the region and prompt nations such as Turkey and Saudi Arabia to emulate it, he added.

"Iran is not only Israel's problem, but the problem of the free world and the United States," said Landau, whose appearance was sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and Israel's consulate general in Toronto.

Landau, a former minister of public security, charged that Iran is using international talks on its budding nuclear program to buy time.

Current sanctions are affecting Iran's economy, he allowed, but they will not deter Iran from building a nuclear bomb.

If necessary, "other means" will be used to stop Iran, he said in an allusion to military force.

Calling the Iranian government a "rogue regime" governed by an extreme form of Islamism, Landau accused Iran of working to create a world "without Israel and democracy."

Citing developments in Egypt and Tunisia, he described Islamists as the main beneficiaries of the Arab Spring.

Warning that "this huge earthquake" has yet to run its course, Landau said the Arab Spring may eventually affect American allies such as Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Bahrain.

Striking yet another sombre note, Landau said the Arab world has become more unstable and less friendly to the West, and is a region that mocks human rights and abuses women.

He pointed to Israel as the West's only democratic ally in the Middle East.

In comments on the peace process,

Landau said the unresolved Palestinian issue is not the root cause of instability in the area.

He accused the Palestinian leadership of trying to avoid direct talks with Israel by taking their case for statehood to the United Nations.

Peace between Israel and the Palestinians will be difficult to attain because Israel is seen as an enemy in Palestinian school texts, he added.

"We wait for the day when the Palestinians will have a leader like [Anwar] Sadat who can deliver a peace agreement," he said, referring to the late Egyptian leader who signed a peace treaty with Israel in 1979.

Suggesting that a two-state solution may not defuse Israel's confrontation with the Palestinians, Landau said the establishment of a Palestinian state might not be a viable way of resolving the problem. He didn't elaborate.

The day the music jived

At the mere announcement of their entrance onto the stage at Roy Thomson Hall, the audience shouted its approval, as if we were about to receive two hoary-headed rock stars reprising their roles from the Woodstock Festival more than 40 years ago.

But instead, from the beige and cream-coloured wings of the stage walked Shalom Bard, about to make his conducting debut with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and violinist Maxim Vengerov, returning to Toronto for one of his many visits.

Both men are 38 years old.

Vigorous, youthful and elegant, the talented musical duo strode across the stage obviously appreciating but appearing somewhat surprised, too, by the loud cheers and effusive whoops of delight cascading upon them from every direction in the hall.

They were joining forces in the performance of Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D Major, Op. 35, Bard on the podium, baton sweeping the air, conducting the marvellous orchestra in front of him and the master soloist standing beside him at his left.

Tchaikovsky's violin concerto is, as the TSO's music director Peter Oundjian has said, "one of the greatest challenges" for a violinist to play. Nevertheless, it's hard to imagine that it was scorned by critics after its première in Vienna more than 130 years ago. Today, it's one of the most popular pieces of the classical canon.

Though he stood taller than all of players seated before him and than Vengerov standing at his side, and though he controlled every aspect of the musicians' performance except, of course, their execution of the score, Bard necessarily took a role "underneath" the heart-stirring sounds of the concerto, "behind-the-scenes" so to speak, of the notes and lyrical phrases emanating from the expert playing of the instruments on stage.

And once the music began, Vengerov stood in its centre, fully at the front of the alternately soft and tender or volcanically erupting melodies of Tchaikovsky's rousing, stormy and yet comforting concerto.

He took his cues from Bard.

And then he drew the stunning sounds from the violin with an energy and a passion that were noticed and enjoyed by the orchestra members as well as by the enraptured audience.

The rapport between conductor and soloist was smoothly responsive. Bard was artful, nuanced and calm in his direction, even during the urgent, explosive passages of the third movement.

As we can see from the inset photo, Vengerov appeared to occupy his own dreamy inner landscape to which, thankfully, he granted the audience private access.

After he performed the violin concerto, Vengerov conducted and performed in Rimsky-Korsakov's famously evocative, sensual symphonic work, Scheherazade.

He commanded the evening.

In anticipation of his conducting debut with the TSO,

Bard recently told The CJN, "This is literally a dream come true. I've daydreamed about this. I've sat as a clarinetist in the symphony. It seems like only yesterday that I used to think, 'Wouldn't it be great [to be a conductor]?' and now I'm here. It's amazing," he said.

"But whatever I'm doing at any given moment, even if it's a piece I've never heard before, the live sound of it becomes a special thing."

The sounds and the images of the Bard-Vengerov collaboration were indeed very special for the audience as well.

At the conclusion of the concerto, the audience repeated the very loud, long and effusive expressions of gratitude and delight. The ovation lasted for more than 10 minutes.

In a very real sense, Bard and Vengerov are the avatars of the next generation of the classical music hall. Perhaps they will be, or are already, the rock stars of classic music – if the question is not misplaced or silly or impertinent. But we can certainly use some of the parlance. And those of us who were in attendance last month and saw and heard the performance of the Tchaikovsky violin concerto by the TSO under the baton of the young Shalom Bard, with the solo violin playing of the young Maxim Vengerov, can certainly say that we were there in Roy Thomson Hall the day the music jived.

Wanted philanthropist arrested in Toronto

Compiled by CJN Staff

Nathan Jacobson, a Winnipeg-born Jewish Canadian businessman who was known for his philanthropy and commitment to Jewish and Israeli causes, was arrested Oct. 25 at his home in Toronto.

Along with 17 others, Jacobson, now 58, who has dual Canadian-Israeli citizenship, was charged in 2006 by a U.S. grand jury in San Diego with 313 counts related to Affpower, an Internet pharmacy based in Costa Rica that dispensed drugs to Americans without legal prescriptions from 2004 to 2006.

He was originally charged with several counts of fraud, money laundering and the distribution and dispensing of controlled substances, but he co-operated with authorities and pleaded guilty in 2008 to laundering the $46 million in drug payments.

He was expected to serve a four-year sentence, but a

San Diego District Court judge issued a warrant for Jacobson's arrest after he failed to show up for a sentencing hearing this past summer.

He was denied bail after his arrest last week after a Canadian judge reportedly certified an international warrant issued for a flight risk. His next court appearance was slated to be Oct. 31.

In the four years since his guilty plea, Jacobson has remained active in the Jewish community. Among other positions, he has been chair of the Canadian branch of Nefesh B'Nefesh and has served on the boards of Tel Aviv University, the Tel Aviv Foundation, and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee. He has also been honorary co-chair of a Canadian Friends of Hebrew University gala dinner.

In 2010, he was honoured at the annual Y sports dinner in Winnipeg for his commitment to the Jewish community.

90-year-old mugged outside Baycrest

Senior swarmed by three women

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

An elderly man leaving Baycrest after visiting his wife was mugged and robbed in what police are calling a distraction theft.

Ninety-year-old Harry Behr was "swarmed" by three women speaking a foreign language who surrounded him, grabbed his arm and appeared to be giving him jewelry.

Despite his protestations, "I don't want, I don't want," the women persisted in assaulting him. Eventually they "ran off to a car that was waiting and took off," said Behr's daughter, Rise Wegler.

When Behr realized what had happened, he found a gold necklace and pendant were missing, as was a heavy gold bracelet. "It happened so fast, I didn't even know what was happening," he said.

Wegler said the jewelry is worth thousands, but also has tremendous sentimental value, as her father had been wearing the bracelet for 50 years and the pendant of Moses holding the 10 Commandments was a gift from her mother, Sabine, who now resides in Baycrest's long-term care facility.

"Dad was so bamboozled by all of them. He says they were in their 30s, but it happened in the blink of an eye."

"Thank God they didn't kill him or push him down."

The incident took place at 3:45 p.m. on Oct. 21, but despite the hour, there were no witnesses or security guards present, Wegler said.

Wegler questions whether security at Baycrest is adequate and how well they respond to incidents like the one that "traumatized" her father.

"I think this is something everybody should be aware of... the community should know. It's a safety issue," Wegler is also upset with the response of Baycrest officials, who she said "never called to see how my dad was... I am distraught and angry over their lack of compassion towards this incident."

Victor Oliveira, who is in charge of security at Baycrest, said the centre has security cameras at all its doors, including Entrance 7, where the incident took place, but Behr was robbed in an area outside the camera's field of vision.

Baycrest was in contact with police following the incident and was told similar "distraction thefts" have been taking place along Yonge Street between Finch and Steeles avenues, mostly targeting elderly women, he said.

Police recommended several security steps, but Oliveira said Baycrest had already adopted some of them. On June 18, he said, the facility added security staff and now had three officers patrolling during the day and another three at night. That more than doubles the centre's earlier security complement.

They are following police suggestions to patrol in irregular and unpredictable patterns.

"We've taken all possible measures to ensure that Baycrest is kept safe," Oliveira said. But these incidents are crimes of opportunity, and the perpetrators will strike when they see no security present. Baycrest is advising visitors and staff to be vigilant and alert, he added.

Baycrest conducted a risk assessment in August 2010 and another in September 2012 "to see the level of security and gaps and was quite satisfied" that the measures in place were superior to those employed at other institutions of similar size, Oliveira said.

And as to Wegler's concerns, Oliveira said he contacted her when he first learned of the incident a day after it occurred. He met Behr and Wegler afterward.

Three days after the event, Behr said he felt "OK. Hopefully it was an isolated incident." He added that he'll continue to visit his wife as he has done every day for the past three years.

Thornhill rabbi's contract not renewed

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Thornhill's Shaar Shalom Synagogue has been "struggling" recently, and its board of governors and executive have decided not to renew Rabbi Martin Berman's contract, according to an Oct. 19 letter emailed to congregants by shul president Janice Shachter.

Rabbi Berman, 62, was ordained in 1977 and has led the congregation since 1994. His contract will end on July 17, 2013.

"He has been with us, through good times and bad, since July 1994, and we have all shared experiences with him during that time. We will miss him and sincerely wish him all the best," Shachter wrote in the e-mail. She clarified in an interview that he is not being fired.

The Conservative congregation is "going through no more nor less than other congregations in North America," Shachter told The C/JN last week.

The 38-year-old synagogue, located just north of Don Mills Road and Steeles Avenue, has about 550 member units, down from just under 600 in April 2008.

"We have... had to make some very tough decisions over the last two years," she wrote in her email, referring to the closure of Shaar Shalom's congregational Hebrew school three years ago for demographic reasons and the move to discontinue off-site High Holiday services this year.

Shaar Shalom Synagogue

Both changes proved correct from a financial perspective, she added.

Rabbi Berman, speaking generically about whether Shaar Shalom's decisions reflect a larger situation, told The C/JN he thinks it's "easy to blame the rabbi when there are lots of factors going on in the synagogue's growth or lack of growth."

He said he was informed Oct. 19 by Shachter of the final decision not to renew his contract. No reason was given, he added.

The rabbi said there were "some problems [and] we went through a difficult time about five years ago," when his previous contract was up for renewal, but that he thought the problems were resolved.

Shachter confirmed that the rabbi was given a one-year contract at the time, before his current five-year contract was signed.

She said that a financial settlement was being negotiated.

Shachter told The C/JN that most North American synagogues are trying to keep their members and also attract the unaffiliated.

"It's a difficult time for synagogues with our current model," she said, alluding in large part to annual membership dues.

Other models being explored in the United States include donations and month-to-month payments in lieu of annual dues, she said.

As well, she added, "You need relevancy to increase membership, and you need membership to solve your financial situation. It's about being viable. The shul is a business as well as a religious institution."

Changes at Shaar Shalom, based in part on feedback from congregants at its June annual general meeting, have included monthly young family services for the past year and a half and a new Simchat Torah format for the morning service this year. The holiday service included a half-hour mid-morning lunch for the congregation. Between 75 and 100 children attended Erev Simchat Torah services, Shachter said.

In her email to congregants, she said a search committee for the next spiritual leader will be struck after a "let's-figure-out-the-criteria" committee lays the groundwork.

The synagogue, which is traditional Conservative and remains affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, has not made any kind of decision to alter its ritual practices, she said, denying rumours to the contrary. "We are not looking at changing anything about our traditional service."

That includes a full Torah reading and women not receiving aliyot, Rabbi Berman said, adding that he instituted a special women's Torah reading for Simchat Torah. As well, as of this year, women are permitted to have the honour of glilah, or wrapping the Torah.

Rabbi Berman said he and his wife would like to stay in Toronto when his contract expires. "I'm going to have to explore and see what I can do."

Remembering...

Times flows on: the years roll by. One generation's agonies become an entry in the next generation's history books. Before we bid our last farewell we strive always to ensure that the memories of one generation become also the memories of all generations.

Thus we remember that 17 years ago on the 12th day of Cheshvan (Nov. 4, 1995), Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was murdered mere moments after he spoke of his hopes for peace to a large gathering of Israelis in Tel Aviv.

One of the Israelis there, distrusting of the prime minister and of his plans for the future, decided that it was within God's law, if not within the mere laws of man, to kill the prime minister. Yigal Amir's disapproval of Rabin's policies led him to demonize the prime minister, to disentitle the prime minister to the very right to live. He felt righteously justified in taking Rabin's life away. And so, cravenly but with evil calculation, Yigal Amir killed Yitzhak Rabin, shooting him in the back.

And thus unfolded, in the words spoken Sunday by Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at a memorial for the slain former prime minister, "one of the greatest crimes in our modern history. It stains Israel's history and the history of Zionism... and will always be remembered as one of the most traumatic events in our nation's history."

We therefore remember Yitzhak Rabin. But, alas, we must also remember that he was murdered by an individual who could not distinguish between demonizing a policy and demonizing a human being.

We must therefore always teach the difference to our children.

...and teaching

And we must, of course, also teach the memories of the slaughter of the generation of the Jews of Europe during the dark days and nights between 1933 and 1945.

At this time of year, near the anniversary of Kristallnacht on Nov. 10, 1938, communities throughout the country, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, from Vancouver to Halifax, provide Holocaust education programs to the wider public.

For example, Montreal is in the midst of a 10-day educational series (Oct. 24 to Nov. 4). Toronto begins its annual Holocaust Education Week today (Nov. 1-8). Ottawa hosts an entire month of Holocaust-related educational programs. The Atlantic Jewish Council, based in Halifax, launched its week of instruction and learning this week on Monday.

Wherever possible, we must try to attend at least one educational program, thereby setting an example that the only way to enshrine memories for generations to come is by teaching those memories to our children.

Congregants should wear kippahs and tallits during services as a sign of communal loyalty, spiritual leader Rabbi Dow Marmur urged members of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple in the bulletin of Canada's largest Reform shul. "Ethnicity is in... the reasons why Reform Jews did not wear kippah and tallit at prayer in the past are no longer relevant," he said.

Antisemitism in Sweden

I lived in Stockholm close to eight years ("No injuries in Malmö bombing," Oct. 4). The Swedish government liberated my mother from a concentration camp in December 1944. The Swedes and Danes saved quite a few Jews from Denmark and Norway. In 1948, I found out that my mother was alive and living in Stockholm. The Swedish government gave me a visa and a permit to reunite with my mother, and allowed us to settle in Sweden. We had a good life in Stockholm. I had a good job, went to school and made a lot of Swedish friends. Antisemitism existed but to a minimum. After seven years, I became a citizen. I can't describe how happy and proud I was. I did military duty, too.

When the Cold War broke out, I had received a lucrative contract from a company in Malmö, and at the same time, my visa for Canada came through. I didn't want to remain in Europe any longer, worrying if there would be a World War III. In 1954, I immigrated to Canada. When I was asked where I came from, with pride I answered, "Sweden."

Now I am ashamed to answer Sweden to the question. Now I say I'm from Poland. It's hard for me to understand how a country can change like that. Malmö, Sweden's third-largest city, has been the site of some of the country's highest-profile attacks on Jews in recent years. I was planning a trip to Stockholm, but I made a promise to myself never to return there. My best decision was to come to Canada.

Racism in the EU

The majority of Roma live in Hungary, Romania, Slovakia and Bulgaria – all members of the European Union ("Roma centre distances itself from anti-Israel protest," Oct. 18). The European Union budgeted 227.5 million Euros ($290 million Cdn) in aid for the Palestinian Authority in 2012. Why instead of disagreeing with our friend, Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney, doesn't Bernie Farber, ex-CEO of the now-defunct Canadian Jewish Congress, make an issue with the European Union about the fact that vast amounts of money are not spent by the EU on improving the life of the Roma. Why doesn't the EU forcefully condemn the racism within EU countries, instead of condemning the settlements in Judea and Samaria and the building of houses in Jerusalem? There is no doubt that the Canadian government is taking the correct step by not letting Canada become a dumping ground for made-in-Europe problems and allowing for easier extradition of failed refugee applicants to Canada.

Muslim leaders should condemn girl's shooting

The shooting of 14-year-old Malala Yousafzai and two of her schoolmates by the Taliban is as disgusting an act as has ever been committed by Muslim extremists. Yousafzai was shot for speaking against the Taliban and for promoting education for girls. I know that once again, Muslims will say that the act was committed by radicals and does not reflect mainstream Muslim thinking or Islamic law. If the shooting is as abhorrent to Muslims as it is to others throughout the world, why have there not been statements from more Muslim leaders condemning the shooting or even a resolution brought by Arab states before the UN Security Council condemning the Taliban for this act and other outrageous attacks. The western world has a strange ally in Pakistan, which allows the Taliban and Al Qaeda to move about freely and, of course, even allowed the leader of Al Qaeda, the now-deceased Osama bin Laden, to live within a mile of a military base for five years. It's time for Muslim religious and political leaders to once and for all, unequivocally, condemn as anti-Islam so-called religious riots and oppression of women, including forcing them to be circumcised and denying them an education. Then and only then will it be clear that mainstream Islam supports freedom of religion, freedom of choice and equality between men and women.

1941 World Series featured true heroes

Rafael Medoff
JNS.org

The 1941 World Series is widely remembered as the first "Subway Series," when two New York City teams vied for baseball's championship. It was also the scene of one of the most famous plays in baseball history, when a rare dropped third strike changed the outcome of a game and, ultimately, the series.

But that year's World Series can also be remembered as the one that featured a player, a manager, and an owner who tried to warn the world about the danger of Adolf Hitler and the Nazis.

The New York Yankees won the opening game, 3-2. The Brooklyn Dodgers took the second by the same score. It was shaping up to be one of the most exciting World Series contests ever.

For the third game, the Yankees turned to their young pitching sensation, Marius "Lefty" Russo. In just his second full season as a Yankees starter, the Queens, N.Y., native had become arguably the best pitcher on the team. Russo won 14 games in 1941, including a one-hitter, and had made the all-star team.

As Russo took the mound that afternoon, very few in the Ebbets Field stands realized that he actually was one of the era's rare two-sport stars. As a student at Long Island University in the 1930s, Russo excelled on the baseball diamond, but he was also a starter for the LIU Blackbirds' basketball team, a national powerhouse. In the 1935-1936 season, Russo and his teammates won 33 straight games by an average margin of 23 points.

The 1936 Olympics, scheduled to be held in Nazi Germany, marked the first time basketball would be part of the competition. The Long Islanders stood a strong chance of being chosen to represent the United States in Berlin – until the players' consciences got the better of them. In March 1936, on the eve of the qualifying tournament at Madison Square Garden, university president Tristram Metcalfe shocked the sports world with his announcement that the Blackbirds had decided to boycott Hitler's Olympics.

In view of Hitler's anti-Jewish abuses, Metcalfe explained, the players decided "that the United States should not participate in Olympic Games since they are being held in Germany," and they would "not compete (in the tryouts) because the university would not under any circumstances be represented in the Olympic Games held in Germany."

Such a stance was almost unheard of in the sports world. Even more so in those days than today, athletes seldom spoke their minds on public affairs, much less put their careers on the line to protest events overseas. Sadly, however, few followed their lead. Aside from Russo and the Blackbirds, only a handful of other American athletes boycotted the 1936 games. The U.S. team proceeded to Hitler's Berlin.

Five years later, Russo found himself on the mound in the third game of the World Series, matched against the Brooklyn Dodgers' Freddie Fitzsimmons. At age 40, Fitzsimmons was nearing the end of his career, but he pitched his heart out that day. He and Russo were locked in a scoreless duel when Russo came to bat with two outs in the top of the seventh inning. Pitchers are usually an easy out, but Russo hit a wicked line drive that broke Fitzsimmons's kneecap. That forced the Dodgers to bring in a relief pitcher, Hugh Casey – who promptly gave up four hits and two runs, enough for the Yankees to win, 2-1. They now led the series two games to one.

With Casey on the mound again the next day, the Dodgers came battling back. They carried a 4-3 lead into the ninth inning. With two outs, no runners on base, and the Ebbets Field crowd about to explode in joy, Casey threw what would have been the game-winning third strike. The Dodgers would have won the game and tied the series at two games apiece. But in one of the most shocking moments in baseball history, catcher Mickey Owen mishandled the third strike, batter Tommy Henrich reached first base safely, and the Yankees proceeded to mount a rally to win the game.

One might assume that after such a heart-breaking loss, Dodgers manager Leo Durocher would have spent the evening strategizing for the next game, or perhaps drowning his sorrows in a local bar. Instead, he and Dodgers owner Larry McPhail headed for a political rally at Madison Square Garden. Along with an array of Hollywood stars and other celebrities, Durocher and McPhail spent the evening at "Fun to Be Free," a demonstration urging the United States to launch a pre-emptive military strike against Adolf Hitler.

This was not a popular position to take in the early autumn of 1941, two months before Pearl Harbor. Gallup polls during 1940-41 found only about one-tenth of Americans willing to go to war for any reason other than to fend off an invasion of the United States itself. The hardships of the Great Depression had intensified the popular view that domestic concerns required America's full attention and that none of the nation's resources should be diverted overseas. The America First movement and other isolationist groups flourished.

But a minority of Americans vigorously disagreed. They established the Fight for Freedom Committee, which advocated war against Hitler as the only way to preserve world peace. Their "Fun to Be Free" event, held at Madison Square Garden on Oct. 5, 1941, featured a "mammoth revue" of patriotic songs, skits mocking Hitler and Mussolini, and dramatic readings emphasizing the need for quick American military intervention.

The pageant, which was attended by an audience of more than 17,000, was authored by two of Hollywood's most prominent screenwriters, Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur. Hecht would later play a leading role in the Bergson Group, a political action committee that lobbied for U.S. action to rescue Jews from the Holocaust. Of course, had the United States taken early action against Hitler, there might never have been a Holocaust at all.

"Fun to Be Free" was produced by Oscar Hammerstein, Moss Hart, and George Kaufman, with music and lyrics by, among others, Irving Berlin and Kurt Weill. The opening act featured Bill "Bojangles" Robinson tap-dancing on a coffin labelled "Hitler." Then Carmen Miranda "sang in her well-known South American style," as the New York Times put it, after which "Eddie Cantor, in a hoopskirt, and Jack Benny put on an Easter Parade act." Among the other stars who took part were Tallulah Bankhead, Melvyn Douglas, George Jessel, Ethel Merman, Helen Hayes, and Burgess Meredith.

Durocher and McPhail not only attended "Fun to Be Free," but they also participated on stage. After Ella Logan finished singing Tipperary, McPhail stepped forward to give her a kiss, and Durocher rose and, according to the Times, "made a little speech to this effect: 'We don't want Hitlerism, we want Americanism. And the Yankees are a great ball club. Even if we lose, we'll be losing in a free country.'"

Leo Durocher, Larry McPhail, and Lefty Russo are remembered for their many contributions to baseball. But perhaps they deserve an extra tip of the cap for having the courage to take an unpopular stand, and for trying to warn a disbelieving world about the danger lurking just around the corner, a danger that many Americans ignored – until it was too late.

Rafael Medoff is founding director of the David S. Wyman Institute for Holocaust Studies in Washington, D.C. His latest book, co-authored with Prof. Sonja Schoepf Wentling, is Herbert Hoover and the Jews: The Origins of the 'Jewish Vote' and Bipartisan Support for Israel.

My irrational connection to the Golan

During chol hamoed Sukkot, my family and I took a few days off in the Golan Heights, a favourite place of mine here in Israel. One of my closest friends, another ex-Torontonian, and his family joined us from Tel Aviv.

We enjoyed days of horseback-riding, kayaking on the Jordan River, driving through Druze villages, the holiday village in which we stayed in the southern Golan, and the panorama from a viewpoint that's part of that village, spectacularly overlooking all of Lake Kinneret and a large swath of the upper Galilee to the north, west and south.

We also took pleasure in dining at fine restaurants in Katzrin, An'i'am and Nov, where the fare was mostly superior cuts of beef, in keeping with the Wild-West pioneering spirit that pervades the Golan and the multitude of cattle that seem to roam everywhere.

Driving around is a challenge. About five years ago, while on a camping vacation on the Heights, I hit a large wolf near Alonei Habashan, totalling my car, not to mention the wolf. My kids didn't much care about the car. To them I was a mur-derer. And Golan thoroughfares continue to be perilous, with a menagerie of wild animals dashing across roads with no warning. Huge boars are the scariest.

I most enjoyed the conversations at mealtimes or in our cabins early in morning or late in the evenings. They provided opportunities to share thoughts on assorted topics. Most compelling were those in which my 17-year-old daughter and my friend's 17-year-old son also took part. Both are 12th graders on the verge of new chapters in their lives. Anxiety and anticipation precede military service – how it might affect their lives, their future plans and their personal liberty – as they discussed the meaning of national service as opposed to individual needs and desires. We parents took a back seat, looking on in wonderment, pride and a pinch of trepidation as we listened to our young adults intelligently expressing convincing arguments on these and other matters.

Yair Lootsteen

We also talked about why we feel strongly about the Golan while being ambivalent regarding Judea and Samaria much closer to home. I for one would find it much harder to relinquish this stretch of land to Syria than giving up parts of the West Bank to the Palestinians.

It has something to do with the physical beauty of the place, which is much greener than the rest of Israel, as well as its relative abundance of water; its apple and cherry orchards; its cattle; its black basalt rock so prevalent everywhere; the low density of people, and its frontier atmosphere. And despite the underlying tension of being so close to Lebanon, Syria and Jordan, replete with fenced-off minefields scattered all over the place, I feel at ease when I'm there.

It's also connected to the fact that Israel has annexed the Golan and that its 20,000 or so Druze residents living in four villages in its most northerly region were offered Israeli citizenship. Most refused, preferring to remain loyal citizens of Syria, but they live peacefully with roughly the same number of Jewish Israelis living in more than 30 towns, kibbutzim and moshavim.

While the international community refuses to recognize Israel's annexation of the Golan, viewing it as occupied Syrian territory, from a domestic standpoint, there's a huge difference between it and the West Bank. Israeli law applies in the Golan, while Judea and Samaria continue to be occupied territory ruled by an IDF military government. Between 1.4 and 2.4 million Palestinians (depending on who's counting), with limited political rights, live there uneasily (that's an understatement) with 350,000 Israelis.

I know we Jews have a stronger biblical bond with the West Bank, but I feel a much stronger connection to the Golan. It's not necessarily rational. Maybe it's because I served in Judea and Samaria for so many years while in the IDF and know how deeply rooted tensions really are.

At sunset one evening during our Golan getaway, we found ourselves having coffee at Kofi Anan, a Hebrew play on words meaning Cloud Café, atop Mount Bental, a deserted IDF installation dug into the mountain. With views in all directions, we peered into the deserted Syrian town of Quneitra in the valley to the east and into flourishing Kibbutz Merom Hagolan to the west.

The view to the west is much more pleasurable, and I look forward to enjoying it for many years to come.

Israeli election: it's the economy, Shimon

While President Barack Obama and Republican challenger Mitt Romney trade insults and sound bites in the American election, the Israeli version is very different. Benjamin Netanyahu is likely to remain prime minister after Jan. 22 – although widely criticized, his policies most closely match the Israeli consensus, and there are no figures with the stature to seriously challenge him.

Therefore, the real battles are between the dozen or so political parties that are jockeying for power, and among the candidates within each party. They represent different social and political constituencies (Israel isn't divided into regional districts or ridings), and each seeks to gain the allegiance of uncommitted voters.

In the process, issues such as Iran's nuclear program, the regional turmoil (once optimistically labelled the "Arab Spring") and preventing terror from Gaza and Sinai will get little discussion because there are few differences. Israeli voters, in general, understand the complexities (much better than many foreign observers) and give little credence to politicians with simple solutions to issues of war and peace.

Instead, the focus is on domestic issues – economics, burden sharing, exemptions from military service for the large haredi community, and corruption in the political system. The Labor party, with a new leader, Shelly Yachimovich, has brought in the leaders of last year's mass demonstrations against rising prices and the shortage of affordable housing. A revival of the Labor party, which controlled the Israeli government until Begin's victory in 1977, and then returned to lead the disastrous Oslo "peace process," will mark a major shift.

In the Likud, Netanyahu will emphasize security and economic leadership and stability amid a world recession, in comparison to Yachimovich's rhetoric.

Among younger politicians, the competition is intense, and Likud candidates will pull to the right. Many will highlight their Zionist credentials by demanding the legalization of unauthorized settlements and curbing European efforts to manipulate Israelis, in competition with Avigdor Lieberman's Israel Beitenu (Israel is our Home) party. In 2009, Lieberman surprised pundits by emerging as the head of the third-largest party, expanding significantly beyond his Russian base.

Kadima, which was the largest party in 2009, gaining 29 out of 120 seats, may not survive. Tzipi Livni, the party leader until a few months ago, is viewed as a failure, while her replacement, former IDF chief Shaul Mofaz, is another ex-general lacking political common sense. And Ehud Olmert, who inherited the positions of prime minister and head of Kadima after then-prime minister Ariel Sharon's stroke, remains a liability after the failed 2006 Lebanon war and corruption trials, including one conviction to date. Talk of Olmert's political comeback is just that – talk.

Gerald Steinberg
in Jerusalem

Among religious voters – about 20 per cent of the Jewish population – the Shas (Sephardi Torah Guardians) party has the widest following and may expand with the return of former Interior Minister Arye Deri, 10 years after he completed a prison sentence for corruption. Many Shas voters dispute the justice of his conviction, and his popularity is likely to stem the switch to Likud.

Deri is also a pragmatic national figure who might be able to break the deadlock in the conflict over mass military service exemptions granted to yeshiva students. The High Court struck down the exemptions as discriminatory, and a compromise that would gradually lead to army service and the re-integration of the haredi sector into the broader Israeli economy would gain wide support from religious and secular voters.

Finally, there are a significant number of younger secular Israelis (and some not so young) who are alienated from the anachronistic parties and ideological divisions. Some may vote for new Labor, with the emphasis on economic reform, and others for the latest "centrist" party, headed by Yair Lapid, a charismatic actor/filmmaker/presenter/columnist with vague positions on the major issues of the day.

With so many different dimensions to follow, the campaign promises to be interesting and will again demonstrate Israel's thriving, if less than perfect, democracy. Among the many miracles in the restoration of Jewish sovereignty, this is another one that should not be taken for granted.

Obama, Romney proclaim pro-Israel positions

To hear Republican party presidential candidate Mitt Romney tell it, U.S. President Barack Obama, the Democratic party incumbent, has royally messed up in the Middle East, having distanced himself from Israel, having failed to slow Iran's nuclear program and having responded incoherently to the Arab Spring rebellions in the Arab world.

With the Nov. 6 election looming on the horizon, Romney has delivered a scathing critique of Obama's Mideast policy, having attempted to portray him as a weak, ineffective leader who lacks a clear and vigorous Mideast strategy.

At a time when the anemic state of the American economy is by far the chief concern of voters, the Middle East is not exactly a hot-button topic. But because Jews are a key electoral demographic in such swing states as Florida, Pennsylvania and Ohio and play an important role in fund-raising, the Mideast is an issue the candidates can ignore only at their peril. Obama and particularly Romney have thus harped on the Mideast to curry favour with Jews and evangelical Christians, many of whom are pro-Israel.

Attack ads by pro-Republican lobbying groups, such as the Emergency Committee for Israel, have questioned Obama's commitment to Israel, decrying his failure to visit the Jewish state since assuming his position in 2009. In last week's third debate, Romney mentioned this, too. "You skipped Israel, but you went to other nations," he said in a reference to Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Turkey.

The truth of the matter is that most U.S. presidents since Harry Truman, including pro-Israel figures such as Lyndon Johnson and Ronald Reagan, have not even visited Israel, while George W. Bush waited until his second term to go there.

Democrats have responded furiously to misleading Republican ads, accusing Republicans of cynically turning Israel into a partisan wedge issue by "replacing reality with distortion and fantasy," as Sen. Frank Lautenberg (New Jersey) recently exclaimed.

Romney, who has visited Israel four times, most recently in July on a photo-op and fundraising trip, has tried to create the impression that the Obama administration has mishandled the Arab Spring, has not been sufficiently tough with Iran and has put "daylight" between the United States and Israel, which enjoys bipartisan support in Congress.

Speaking in nebulous generalities, Romney claims that Obama has squandered opportunities to lead Arabs "from oppression to freedom." Romney, however, has not spelled out what he would have done differently as pro-American regimes in Egypt and Tunisia fell by the wayside, nor has he explained how his policy on the current uprising in Syria would be any different.

Calling Obama's stance on Iran his worst foreign policy failure, Romney claims he allowed the mullahs to expand Iran's nuclear program. Romney says he would impose "crippling sanctions" on Tehran and ensure it does not gain even the capability of producing nuclear weapons, but he has stopped short of threatening military action.

Claiming the Obama administration's support of Israel is weak-kneed, Romney says Obama has thrown it "under the bus," has vowed to be a better friend than Obama and promised to visit Israel on his first trip abroad as president.

Like Obama, Romney supports a two-state solution to resolve Israel's conflict with the Palestinians, yet he has said that the Palestinians "have no interest in peace" and that the problem will probably remain unresolved.

Due to Israel's ill-conceived settlement policy in the West Bank, as well as Obama's abortive attempt to convince Israel to impose a permanent freeze on the construction of settlements there, Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu have generally had chilly relations. But in all other respects, the Obama administration has been exceedingly supportive of Israel, especially in vital security matters.

Obama, who visited Israel on the eve of the 2008 U.S. presidential election, has provided financial and technical assistance to Israel for the development of its short-range Iron Dome and long-range Arrow missile defence systems.

And he has permitted Israel to buy the most advanced U.S. fighter jet, the F-35.

In addition, the United States gives Israel more than $3 billion in annual aid.

"I have made it a top priority for my administration to deepen co-operation with Israel across the whole spectrum of security issues, — intelligence, military, technology," Obama has said. "Our commitment to Israel's security must never waver." Or, as he put it last week, "Our bond with Israel [is] unbreakable."

Obama's press secretary, Jay Carney, has said, "We have an extremely close relationship with Israel, which is appropriate, given our unshakeable commitment to Israel's security."

This is not mere rhetoric. Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak has declared that Obama has been "an extremely strong" supporter of Israel with regard to its security. "I can hardly remember a better period of American support and backing... than what we have right now."

On Iran, the United States and Israel have co-operated closely, sharing intelligence, trying to disable its spinning centrifuges through cyber warfare (Operation Olympic Games) and working on missile defences to counteract Iran's offensive capabilities.

Washington, in co-operation with the United Nations and the European Union, has slapped debilitating economic sanctions on Iran. Obama has warned Iran that "all options are on the table," that containment is not the sum of U.S. policy and that Iran will not be permitted to acquire a nuclear arsenal, period. Since Obama, like Romney, prefers to resolve this problem through diplomatic means, he has urged Israel to refrain from launching a pre-emptive attack on Iran.

On the political front, the Obama administration has fought efforts to delegitimize Israel and condemned attempts to boycott Israel. The United States derailed a campaign by the Palestinian Authority to achieve full membership in the UN, and vetoed a UN Security Council resolution to condemn Israeli settlements in the West Bank, even though it considers them illegal and illegitimate. Obama, too, has pressured Egypt's new president to abide by its peace treaty with Israel.

Despite the candidates' proclivity to pander to Israel, American Jews will most likely judge them on the basis of domestic policies. "Our polls shows that you cannot appeal to the voters through the single issue of Israel," says Robert Jones the chief executive officer of the Public Religion Research Institute.

Another point worth considering is that American Jews tend to be Democrats. A survey conducted by the American Jewish Committee about a month ago indicated that 65 per cent of Jews plan to vote for Obama, compared to 24 per cent for Romney. Ten per cent remain undecided.

Although Romney might sometimes sound more pro-Israel in rhetorical terms than his opponent, most Jewish voters know that Israel has a true friend in Obama. On Nov. 6, a significant majority of American Jews will cast their ballots for the Democrats, Israel notwithstanding.

Community 'stars' recognized by Ve'ahavta

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee is honouring six people for their contributions to various communities at its annual Tikun Olam Awards Ceremony on Nov. 4.

Founded in 1996, Ve'ahavta helps those in need both locally and abroad, and builds connections between Jews and non-Jews around the world.

The organization's current campaign is called "Could It Be Me?" and this year's award ceremony is set to be a major source of fundraising for the campaign, which has a goal of raising $1 million.

Musician Steven Page, formerly of the Barenaked Ladies, will host Starry Nights 2012 at which awards in five categories: remembrance, humanitarianism, community, education and young leadership, will be presented.

Adam Hummel is this year's young leadership award winner. The 27-year-old lawyer is being recognized for helping communities in Kenya.

In 2008, Hummel spent three weeks there volunteering in a village called Kiptere. He learned about the violence following the 2007 general elections in Kenya, which led to the death of some 1,300 people and the displacement of hundreds of thousands more.

Much of this violence stemmed from racism between tribes, Hummel said, so he decided to work to break down the racial barriers. To do that, he started a soccer tournament.

"There are 42 tribes in Kenya, and we wanted to try to engage a few of them at least, to come together, work together, play together," he said, adding that his tournament ultimately involved three of the tribes.

In addition to bringing the tribes together, the tournament also broke down some of the barriers between the audience members' tribes. Hummel ran peace seminars to engage the audience, as well.

While in Kenya, he also created Youth Ambassadors for Peace – an organization that is still going strong.

Robyn Segall, manager of marketing and public relations for Ve'ahavta, said Hummel's work stood out, especially due to his youth.

"He saw a need and created a response," she said. "We all walk around and see a need but don't always create the response. We want to, but we don't always have the drive to make it happen."

However, he truly took on the issue and [worked] to solve the problem, she said.

Hummel, the youngest award recipient, said he was caught off-guard when he learned he was receiving the award.

Isaac Sobol is another of the six honorees at this year's ceremony. At age 41, he graduated from medical school, after an eclectic career history that included stunts as an advertising copywriter, a rock-band manager, an animal caretaker in the United Kingdom and elsewhere.

Since finishing medical school in the '80s, he has worked with native communities around Canada, as well as in eastern Tibet, helping to improve the health of the local populations.

"I saw there was a pretty big disparity between the health status of aboriginal and First Nations people in that community and Canadians in general," Sobol said. He wanted to go where people needed the help, to "have an opportunity to contribute to a group of the Canadian population that has not been best served, at least in the health-care system."

His first job took him to a Metis community in Saskatchewan. He said it was an honour to live on the reserve, where he could hear the local songs and dance and share in feasts with the people who lived there.

Just last year, Sobol finished a six-year term in Nunavut as the chief officer of health. Working in the territory, which has a mostly Inuit population, showed him there is a disparity between the health of aboriginal populations and the general Canadian population. Life expectancy is 12 years shorter in Nunavut than in the rest of Canada, he said, and Inuit are susceptible to diseases that have been virtually wiped out in the West.

"I'm conscious of the fact there's great social inequity in Canada," he said. "By reason of colonialism and misplaced policies over more than a century, aboriginal people have been marginalized, and we have passed laws to abolish their culture."

Sobol said his parents inspired his work. His father is a doctor, and Sobol was influenced by both of his parents' ethics and values.

Other award winners are Holocaust survivors Elly Gotz and Faye Schulman for remembrance, Dr. Phillip Berger for community, and Ellen Schwartz for education.

Israeli democracy in danger, NIF panel hears

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

Canada's Jewish community must speak out to ensure Israel continues to be a Jewish democratic country, said Peter Beinart, author of The Crisis of Zionism.

"The miracle of Israel's creation is today imperilled by Israel's control of the West Bank," he said at the New Israel Fund of Canada's second annual symposium on Oct. 21.

"This is not to say that Jews should not be able to live in the West Bank... The problem is that today, contrary to the vision of Israel's founders, citizenship is ethnically based," added Beinart, a professor of journalism and political science at the City University of New York.

The symposium, titled Engaging with Israel Today: Conversations We Need to Have, led by interim Liberal leader Bob Rae, was designed to have an open discussion about Israel's policies, "even if those conversations are difficult," said NIF Canada executive director Orit Sarfaty. "You can talk critically about Israel in support of Israel."

Established 30 years ago, NIF Canada

supports grassroots projects in Israel that strengthen human and civil rights, promote religious pluralism, reduce economic inequality and integrate immigrants and Arabs into Israeli society. Since its establishment, it has funded more than 800 projects.

The sold-out event hosted some 500 people in Toronto to hear talks from author Peter Beinart; NIF board member Talia Sasson, who worked for 25 years in Israel's State Attorney's office, and Janice Gross Stein, professor of conflict management and director of the Munk School for Global Affairs at the University of Toronto, followed by a panel discussion with all three speakers.

Peter Beinart

Sarfaty, who joined NIFC at the beginning of October, was born in Israel but said that after living for many years as a Toronto Jew, she understands that sometimes criticism of Israel is not always accepted.

"This is a culture that hasn't traditionally embraced difficult conversations, but in the overwhelming support and demand [for the symposium], we had a 100-person waiting list. People are desperately wanting to have these conversations," she said.

She wasn't the only one who recognized that the local Jewish community could be touchy about criticism of Israel.

"One thing that struck me is that it's actually easier to have this conversation in Israel than on Bathurst Street," Rae said.

And if the Jewish community does not allow these conversations to happen, some Jews will become isolated from the community, Beinart argues.

"Israel's next crisis may come not with the Palestinians or Iran but with young American Jews," says the front page of Beinart's website. "The refusal of many Jewish organizations to defend democracy in the Jewish state is alienating many young liberal Jews from Zionism itself."

While Beinart said that Palestinians bear significant blame for the failure to achieve a two-state solution, he said Israel's policies – its occupation of the West Bank and its treatment of Palestinians who live there – are only "pushing Palestinians in the direction we don't want them to go."

And North American Jewish leaders can no longer afford to be silent, he said.

"The real reason for the silence goes deeper – the only kind of threat that our leaders feel comfortable discussing are threats from the outside, like Iran and Hezbollah," Beinart told the crowd. "There's an unwillingness to recognize that today, some of our challenges come not from our weaknesses but from our power."

Israel suffers from other internal threats as well, Stein argued. "Unemployed young men who see no future for themselves is the biggest security threat in the Middle East," she said.

While the symposium drew a large, mostly older crowd, not all Jewish organizations support the New Israel Fund and NIF Canada, which is vocal in its opposition to Israeli settlements and inequalities between Jews and Arabs in Israel.

The NIF has been criticized by other groups that claim it funds organizations that support the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel.

But Sarfaty clarified that her group has "firm guidelines, and will not fund projects with organizations that have explicit anti-Zionist policies, including BDS."

She added: "We're staunchly against BDS, and we have withdrawn funding because of the difference in opinion there."

Beinart said he's concerned for the future if current trends he sees aren't reversed.

"The conversations I worry about are the ones I may have one day with my six-year-old son and my four-year-old daughter if we let the dream of a democratic Jewish state die on our watch," Beinart said. "I want them to put up, one day, a flag of a democratic Jewish state in their own children's room."

Gas deposits will supply Israel for 50 years

He said Israel would have been at peace with all its Arab neighbours long ago had they been like Canada, but that in the absence of such neighbours, the War of Independence of the Jewish people in Israel goes on.

Landau estimated that the discovery of natural gas deposits in the Mediterranean Sea will supply Israel's needs for the next 50 years. These deposits are an important element of Israel's energy independence and national security, he said.

He expressed hope that natural gas, rather than gasoline, can revolutionize transportation in Israel in the near future.

Israel also hopes to use its natural gas reserves to develop better relations with Jordan and the Palestinian Authority and thereby achieve regional stability, he said.

Landau was introduced by Joe Oliver, Canada's minister of natural resources and Conservative MP for Eglinton-Lawrence.

Oliver, who invited Landau to Canada and recently visited Israel, voiced optimism that Canada's current $1.6-billion worth of trade with Israel can be increased through the energy sector.

Hailing Canada's relationship with Israel and paraphrasing a recent comment by Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird, Oliver asserted, "Israel has no greater friend in the world than Canada."

Canada's friendship with Israel reflects Canadian values, said Oliver, the only Jewish minister in Prime Minister Stephen Harper's cabinet.

He said Canada also supports Israel's right to self-defence against terror, abhors the concept of moral relativism in which perpetrators are regarded as victims, and condemns the "oldest and most pernicious hatred, antisemitism."

Canada-Israel energy, science fund established

Sheldon Kirshner

A joint Canada-Israel Energy Science and Technology Fund has been created, Canada's Minister of Natural Resources Joe Oliver and Israel's Minister of Energy and Water Resources Uzi Landau announced Oct. 29.

Under the accord that established the fund, the Canadian and Israeli governments will pursue further co-operation to advance shared energy interests.

The fund will be supported by a $5-million contribution from Canada over the next three years and by Israeli funds on a project-by-project basis.

"This new scientific initiative will create jobs and strengthen the economies of both our countries through greater energy collaboration," Oliver said Oct. 29. "Today's announcement underscores the important strategic relationship between our two countries."

Landau added: "In the endeavour to develop Israel's natural resources, we find in Canada a natural partner to co-operate with and together look for ways to maximize our capabilities."

Baycrest names new director of spiritual care

'There is a wisdom born of life's experiences'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Geoffrey Haber, Baycrest's new director of spiritual care, has been moving toward this position throughout his career.

A native of Montreal, Rabbi Haber, 53, a pulpit rabbi for 23 years in various U.S. and Canadian congregations, says that he has watched families grow and develop.

"I was there for every step of their lives, and for significant life events. Along the way, I grew increasingly interested in geriatric care. This is a significant portion of people's lives, and the ability to find success in later years [lies] in finding continuing purpose," said Rabbi Haber, who has a wife and three adult children.

He succeeds Rabbi Nachum Berlat, who was director of spiritual care at Baycrest for 25 years. Rabbi Berlat is now senior chaplain emeritus and scholar-in-residence.

"Rabbi Berlat was a pioneer in spiritual care. Before he started at Baycrest, [this position] was not on the radar of the Jewish community," Rabbi Haber. "He laid the foundation, and I have come to succeed him and build on that foundation."

Rabbi Haber, who was ordained at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York City, said that every geriatric stage has its own challenges, "and I really witnessed it as I watched my [own] parents age. There is a wisdom born of life's experiences, and Judaism recognizes the value of that."

"Seniors have so much to give, and I want to learn at their feet, and help transmit that wisdom."

As one of the only full-time hospital chaplains in Canada, Rabbi Haber is responsible for the entire Baycrest community, including assisted living, palliative care, the hospital and day programs.

He said he sees four aspects to his role.

"I provide religious and spiritual services to patients family and staff. I am responsible for Baycrest's kashrut. I oversee Shabbat and holiday observances, and I am there for life-cycle events pertaining to families."

Baycrest is an ecumenical institution, he said, and he facilitates the religious and spiritual needs of everyone by reaching out to clergy of other faiths to help provide services to people who require them. "There is a multi-faith chapel, and I make sure everyone has what they need."

A pastoral presence is important in a geriatric facility, he said. "We deal with people in their waning years. Some are facing mortality, which [often] raises deep spiritual questions. People go to their graves either tormented or at peace, based on how they face their life experiences. I help people make that journey."

"Spiritual care is more than ritual observance. It includes a response to life's questions. People's wellness is dependent on wholeness – it is not only physical or mental. People who feel they have a purpose heal better and faster, and medical science is starting to recognize this. A chaplain can contribute to this."

Having extended family in Toronto adds to Rabbi Haber's excitement about coming to Baycrest, "a premiere facility in North America. My hope is to develop a professional staff, so there is more than just one chaplain. In keeping with Baycrest's role as a teaching hospital, I would like it to serve as a site for clinical and pastoral education."

"I would like to [host] intern chaplains who want to know about the geriatric Jewish community, as well as volunteer lay chaplains who could be the eyes and ears of people's spiritual needs. Baycrest is a jewel in the crown of Jewish life, and I would like [as many people as possible] to help out."

Grandkids' book records survivor's story

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CIN

Holocaust survivor Henry Melnick would talk to his grandchildren about his life before World War II and how he survived the horrors of Auschwitz-Birkenau, Buna, Dora-Mittelbau, Bergen-Belsen and other ghettos and concentration camps.

His grandchildren, Limore Ziskind, Michael Melnick and Faith Dantowitz, spearheaded by Ziskind, decided to document his stories, and three years later, they self-published a memoir titled By My Mother's Hand.

Henry Melnick was the sole survivor of his family. The title of his book is a tribute to his mother who he says, "pushed me forward with her hand during a selection, avoiding the line to the death camps."

Melnick, 90, goes to work every day at Start Auto Electric in downtown Toronto.

In an interview, Ziskind talked about why they wanted to write the book.

"We were concerned about the dwindling number of survivors remaining in our grandfather's advancing age, so my cousins and I undertook this massive project – to interview our grandfather, comb through his documents, view the footage of his lectures and chronicle our grandfather's life," she said.

Henry Melnick was born in 1922 in Lodz, Poland, to Chaya and Elijah Chmielnicki.

He had a brother, a sister, aunts, uncles and many cousins. He changed his name to Melnick in 1974.

In 1939, Lodz had a population of 600,000 more than 200,000 of them Jewish. Melnick was 17 when the Germans invaded Poland. In 1940, the family was resettled in the ghetto in the city of Nowy Sącz.

His memoir tells first of his memories as a child growing up Jewish in Lodz and continues with the events he experienced, both horrific and miraculous, after the German invasion and throughout the war years to liberation.

In 1947, he tried to go to Israel with Aliyah Bet, the illegal immigration of Jews to Palestine. They were turned back at the Belgian Border. A year later, the United Nations allowed 10,000 Jews a month to go to Palestine.

Melnick volunteered to go into the army there and fought in Israel's War of Independence.

He came to Canada in 1965 with his wife, Hela, and their two children. His wife died in 1987. He later married Elaine Shumak.

The first time he ever spoke about his war experiences was in 1993 during a trip to Poland for the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising with the members of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

On the bus, the leader of the tour asked if anybody wanted to say something. He was reluctant, but his wife urged him to speak.

After speaking, as I returned to my seat, Anita Eckstein, a member of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto stopped me," Melnick said. "She told me that they needed people like me to speak to groups. This opened the floodgates for me to express my personal testimonial of survival."

Since that time, Melnick has been speaking to students at universities and high schools and to many adult groups across Toronto, in Florida and in other parts of the United States.

"Sixty years ago, if someone told me that this is how my life would turn out, I would never have believed it," said Melnick, who has two children, seven grandchildren and nine great-grandchildren.

"It wasn't enough to just be smart to survive the Holocaust. Being smart didn't change anything. One couldn't figure out anything. There was no way to pre-determine what was going to happen. I must have survived because it was destined."

Concert to feature music from prewar Jewish life

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

A Holocaust Education Week concert at Holy Blossom Temple, titled "Keeping the Music Alive," will feature "triumphant, and very vigorous and energetic" music, according to the congregation's musical director, Cantor Benjamin Maissner.

Benjamin Maissner

Maissner, who is also musical director of Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir, will direct and perform the musical selections, and Holocaust survivors will share their reflections on the music. The concert will take place Nov. 4 at 7:30 p.m.

At a similar concert that Maissner directed for Holocaust Education Week two years ago, survivors spoke of the power of music and how it sustained them in the ghettos and camps, he said.

"It's not a memorial, morbid concert of the Holocaust," Maissner said. "The music reflects Jewish life and Jewish creativity from the countries the Nazis occupied."

The concert will feature Lachan as well as the Holy Blossom Temple Choir (the congregation's professional ensemble), pianist Nadia Adler, and four cantors: Maissner, Charles Osborne, Anna Trubashnik and cantorial soloist Lindi Rivers.

Musical selections originate from every country the Nazis occupied, and date back as far as the 16th century Renaissance and composer Salamone Rossi, Maissner told The CJA.

As well, the concert will feature 20th-century music by German composer Kurt Weill and 19th-century music by Franz Schubert. The well-known Austrian composer was not Jewish, but composed music in honour of Viennese cantor and composer Salomon Sulzer, whose music will also be featured in the concert.

There will be music from the 1675 inauguration of the Spanish Portuguese Synagogue in Amsterdam, as well as a French Baroque-era cantata for circumcision and three selections from the children's opera Brundibar, which was performed in Theresienstadt.

Maissner believes the audience will leave with a better understanding of "the grandeur of the music of the countries that suffered during the war. The point is that the music goes on."

'Not a day goes by that I don't think about the horrors I witnessed'

"Not a day goes by that I don't think about my family and reflect about the horrors I witnessed throughout the Holocaust. All I can ask, now that my story has been shared, is to never forget."

Ziskind has only high praise for her grandfather. He is "an extraordinary human being," she said. "Having lost absolutely everything, he rebuilt his world to include tolerance, understanding and tremendous love."

"Instead of lashing out at the world for the injustices he endured, my grandfather continuously preaches tolerance. It's a lesson this world is far behind in learning."

She said the grandchildren are delighted that By My Mother's Hand has had a tremendous success worldwide.

Polish culture is not antisemitic: scholar

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Antisemitism in contemporary Poland is synonymous with illiberal sentiments," says Adam Michnik, one of Poland's foremost intellectuals.

"Antisemitism is a code name for anti-democratic and anti-liberal attitudes," charged Michnik, the editor of Against Antisemitism, 1936-2009, a new three-volume work published in Polish.

In a recent lecture sponsored by The Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada at the University of Toronto's Wolfond Centre, he said he edited the book to shatter two lingering stereotypes.

Speaking in Polish through two interpreters, he disputed the notion that Poles "imbibe antisemitism with their mother's milk," a phrase coined by Yitzhak Shamir, the late Polish-born prime minister of Israel.

Michnik, a Jew who has referred to himself as a Pole of Jewish origin, also took issue with the claim that antisemitism in Poland was and is a figment of the Jewish imagination.

"I try to show that there was tremendous resistance in Poland to antisemitism, but that it existed," explained Michnik, the editor-in-chief of Gazeta Wyborcza, Poland's largest daily newspaper and a former member of the Solidarity trade union federation, which worked for worker's rights and social change during the tail end of the Communist era.

Michnik, who turned 66 on Oct. 17, was introduced by Piotr Wrobel, a specialist in Polish history at the University of Toronto, who described him as "a historical figure."

Born into a family of Communists, Michnik was a political dissident who spent more than six years in prison for demanding reforms and challenging Communist dogma.

He participated in the Round Table Talks in 1989, playing a key role in the historic process that culminated in free elections, the defeat of Communism and the emergence of western-style democracy in Poland.

After these events, the Solidarity leader Lech Walesa asked him to create a national daily for the movement. Eventually, Gazeta Wyborcza (Election Newspaper) became Poland's leading mass-circulation newspaper.

Michnik, in a brief survey of pre-World War II antisemitism, said right-wing Polish nationalists were pro-Zionist, because they wanted Jews to live in Palestine rather than in Poland.

He suggested that Poles and Jews represented two distinct "nations" and disagreed on a wide range of issues.

Aggressive antisemitism, he noted, was directed against assimilated rather than traditional Polish Jews.

To the Roman Catholic church, only a Catholic could be a real Pole, he added.

Further differences between Poles and Jews emerged during the postwar period, according to Michnik.

Jews generally supported the entry of the Soviet Red Army into Poland after the Holocaust, which decimated about 90 per cent of Polish Jewry. The vast majority of Polish Catholics, however, perceived the Soviet presence as a form of captivity and subjugation, and the Soviet-backed communist government as an alien concept that was forced on them.

Blaming the 1946 pogrom in Kielce on Communist security forces, he said, "The Communists were playing the antisemitic card." They were also finishing the work of the Nazis, who occupied Poland from 1939 to 1945.

The Roman Catholic Church, steeped in antisemitism, refused to explicitly condemn the Kielce pogrom, advising Jews not to get involved in Polish politics.

Since the advent of democracy in Poland, he said, Polish governments have rejected antisemitism.

While antisemitism in modern Poland exists, it's no longer in vogue to be antisemitic.

And in what seemed like a grand summing up, Michnik declared, "Polish culture is not an antisemitic culture."

Rav Barry stresses importance of inclusiveness in Judaism

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Rabbi Barry Schlesinger, or Rav Barry as he likes to be called, believes that people have two choices in life.

The first is to live life as an "extra," to observe what is happening in society, but not play an active role in making change. The second option is to live with purpose.

He has chosen the second option, he said, and he devotes his life to creating welcoming and inclusive Jewish communities where he advocates for religious rights.

Currently in Canada spending the year as interim rabbi for Agudath Israel Congregation in Ottawa, the American-born Rabbi Schlesinger has lived in Israel since 1972 and has been rabbi of Kehillat Moreshet Avraham in Talpiyot, Israel, since 2001.

He spoke last week at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue at a talk sponsored by Mercaz Canada, an organization that promotes and supports Zionist education and programs.

Throughout the evening, Rabbi Schlesinger, along with Rabbi Philip Scheim, Beth David's spiritual leader, and Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, his counterpart at Beth Tzedec Congregation, discussed the successes, challenges and opportunities that arise when trying to foster pluralistic and inclusive communities in Israel.

Rabbi Schlesinger spoke candidly about how in his role as a spiritual leader, he's able to create Jewish communities that are accepting, welcoming and respectful. He believes that every Jewish person should have religious rights, irrespective of their personal circumstances.

"I could choose to be an extra in the unfolding modern-day Jewish movement in Jerusalem and let those who most need to find a Jewish community fall through the cracks. Or I can welcome the people I meet with open arms and help bring them closer to the words of the Torah."

He recounted the story of a young couple that approached him after giving birth to their son.

"They came to me and said they did not want their son to be circumcised, but still wanted to be part of my synagogue. They asked if I would accept them as they were. Easily, I could have rejected them, and told them they needed to follow Jewish custom. But had I done that, I would have not been playing my role. Instead I welcomed them to my congregation."

Rabbi Schlesinger also remembers a female member of his congregation that was denied a get, a divorce document, which according to Jewish law must be presented by a husband to his wife to finalize their divorce.

"For 20 years, this woman was held hostage by her husband. She felt stigmatized and alone. She came to my synagogue and found a community that helped her regain her pride and strength. And finally, when she was granted her get, the whole congregation celebrated with her."

Rabbi Schlesinger believes that his role is to be peaceful and to help people use their circumstances to bring them closer to the Jewish community.

"We need to understand that this path towards inclusiveness is a marathon and not a dash. To reach our goal it requires patience, perseverance and strength. Each day we get a little closer."

Holocaust Education Week Explores the Culture of Memory

32nd Annual HEW features more than 100 Programs Across the GTA

By Daniel Koren

Now entering its 32nd year, Holocaust Education Week (HEW), which runs from November 1 to 8, has become a beacon for the Greater Toronto Area: a civic event with international impact. For this year's program, a particular emphasis will be placed on cultural interpretations of the Holocaust, aimed to educate and inspire Canadians of all ages.

Presented by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, chaired by Honey Sherman, HEW is the largest Holocaust educational forum of its kind, featuring a diverse selection of educational, cultural and community programs every November, engaging Jews and non-Jews alike about the Shoah and its legacies.

This year's program will feature both international and local luminaries exploring the culture of memory, with artistic, testimonial and scholarly programs reflecting upon personal and public remembrance.

"We've taken a new direction this year by placing an emphasis on artistic and literary representations of the Holocaust spanning across generations and nationalities," said Mira Goldfarb, Executive Director of the Neuberger Centre. "Reflecting upon the Culture of Memory invites new audiences and new generations to engage both in the universality and the specificity of the Holocaust. The programs are diverse and compelling, offering multiple points of entry and dialogue."

The opening night program of Holocaust Education Week takes place on Thursday, November 1st at the Royal Ontario Museum with renowned author Nathan Englander (in conversation with Sara R. Horowitz, Director of the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University), whose short story collection What We Talk About When We Talk About Anne Frank, explores Jewish identity in the contemporary, post-Holocaust, world. Englander will appear again to further this subject on the panel "Anne Frank in the Contemporary Imagination," the morning of November 2, at the University of Toronto's Centre for Jewish Studies. Over 100 programs will run throughout the week with international guests as well as local treasures, including a choral concert at Holy Blossom Temple, which will pay homage to the diverse musical traditions of European Jewry, by acclaimed musical director Cantor Benjamin Maissner and the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir, appearances by both current and former Chancellor Rose Wolfe and Ray Wolfe Professors of Holocaust Studies at the University of Toronto, Doris Bergen and Michael R. Marrus, a lecture on creating Holocaust memory by founding Rav of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation (BAYT), Rabbi Baruch Taub, and award-winning author Alison Pick, whose novel Far To Go was long-listed for the prestigious Man Booker Prize.

This year's program will also provide ample opportunities to hear survivor testimony and memoir including several Azrieli series authors and members of the Neuberger Centre's Survivor Speakers' Bureau in conversation with educators.

HEW 2012 will also feature the inauguration of an Artist-in-Residence with Slovak-born Canadian photographer Yuri Dojc, with his compelling series, The Last Folio. His memorial installation was recently completed at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and will be on view during his talk there on November 5 in conversation with U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies Director, Jeffrey Kopstein.

Coinciding with the 74th anniversary of Kristallnacht, closing night of Holocaust Education Week will feature a candle lighting ceremony and a powerful performance by The ARC Ensemble (Artists of the Royal Conservatory) at Beth Tzedec Congregation on November 8. The repertoire to be performed acts as a cultural tikun olam (act to repair the world), embodying the spirit of the Jewish people, and the influence Holocaust Education Week has on its thousands of participants each and every year.

New Leo Baeck South Campus perfect solution for thriving school's needs

By Daniel Horowitz

With the recent dedication of The Leo Baeck Day School's new and highly anticipated South Campus, a new chapter in the life of Jewish Toronto's remarkable Jewish educational system has begun.

The new campus of Leo Baeck, the only Jewish I.B. (International Baccalaureate) World School in Canada, which transformed the former Arlington Middle School into a state-of-the-art educational and cultural facility thanks to a $5 million renovation, is almost four times the size of its home for the last 21 years, a leased space inside Holy Blossom Temple, less than one kilometre from its new digs.

"The school has grown so dramatically in this part of the city that we outgrew our Holy Blossom facility, and have found that this new facility sits in the heart of a vibrant and underserved young Jewish community seeking to reconnect with its Jewish roots," explained Eric Petersiel, Head of School.

The new and improved campus of Leo Baeck – the Reform movement's only day school in Canada – includes large classrooms, a dedicated preschool, state-of-the-art science and computer labs, seminar rooms, a double gymnasium, worship space and art, drama and music studios. And, with the increased space, a Junior Kindergarten has been added for the first time on the South Campus, with almost 100 students already registered in the first year.

The Arlington campus, which Leo Baeck purchased after the Toronto District School Board declared it surplus, will also open its doors to more than just its students, as the community-at-large will use the premium space for meetings, gym rental, art space and theatrical and musical performances.

The new school will also be a beacon for Jewish life in the area, an area which used to be home to a thriving Jewish community prior to many Toronto Jews making the sojourn north along Bathurst Street.

"The new Leo Baeck campus offers opportunities for the larger Jewish community, as a community centre providing programming outside school hours," said Elizabeth Wolfe, Chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and a Past Leo Baeck President. "At a time when new campuses are being developed in the northern part of the GTA, the new Leo Baeck campus will be readily accessible in midtown, and will serve our community for generations."

And, speaking of the larger community, the first outside user of the new facility will be the Koffler Centre of the Arts, which will use the new venue for its Family Ceramic classes.

"It is through similar partnerships with other communal agencies and organizations that the full potential of this new facility will be reached, and its impact on the community realized," added Wolfe.

"UJA Federation applauds the Board of Leo Baeck for their vision and courage in creating this new and exciting campus," said Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "The Arlington Campus will be a flourishing hub of Jewish life and a wonderful addition to the GTA's vital Jewish educational system."

Where is our advocacy?

For two weeks in September, the Hamilton Public Library was home to an art exhibition titled A Child's View from Gaza. Sponsored by the recognizably anti-Israel group Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME), the drawings, in their overall theme, mostly depict Israeli soldiers victimizing hapless Palestinian children.

When viewed without context, the images of the children's evident suffering undoubtedly tug at the heart-strings. But the pathos reflected pictorially is only one aspect of what is so fundamentally troubling about the display. Even more damning is the extensive commentary accompanying each drawing – invoking the all too familiar canards that so often frame the attacks on Israel that we've come to expect from organizations like CJPME.

Whether the drawings themselves are the genuine creations of nine- to 11-year-olds has been called into question. What is indisputable, however, is that the offensive text surrounding the sketches is certainly not composed by children. Rather, it is the work of skilled propagandists intent on portraying the Israel Defence Forces, and, by association, Israelis and Jews in general, in the worst possible light.

When the exhibition opened in Hamilton, it was prominently placed near the library entrance, exposing it to the hundreds of library patrons who ordinarily visit the facility each day. Once this was reported to the public affairs committee (PAC) of the Hamilton Jewish Federation, a strongly worded letter was sent to the library administration, expressing the Jewish community's concern and requesting removal of the pictures. Instead, the most that the library would accede to was a transfer of the display to a less conspicuous location on the library's fourth floor. While the last word." According to the e-blast, their position had the endorsement of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), who apparently agreed that the Hamilton federation "shouldn't draw any more attention to this group or exhibit by going public against it."

Fortunately, there are individuals in the Hamilton community who have refused to remain silent. Some have had letters published in the Spectator and, yes, there have been the inevitable responses. There are also those who have directly confronted the library administration and demanded explanations – and they continue to do so.

And while the organized Jewish community chooses to ignore it, A Child's View from Gaza has travelled across the country, likely influencing the perceptions of many thousands of Canadians who cannot reasonably be blamed for accepting a narrative that, though false, has gone unchallenged.

This gesture was construed as meaningful, there are many in the Hamilton community who believe that a stronger position was needed.

An e-blast from PAC describing its intervention was far from reassuring. Most disconcerting was PAC's admission that its "preferred option was to remain silent at this time." The reservation they expressed about taking the matter to the Hamilton Spectator was that any letters to the newspaper "would only invite more letters in response, most of which would come from the 'other side' and only give them

Tablets – old and new

Tablets, of course, are not new to the Jewish People. Sacred ones, too. Here's how to load up your own tablet (or iPhone) with some holy apps so you can learn some Torah on the go.

This is one very slick program – and even more impressive since it is free! Every parashah in the Torah is divided by aliyyot along with the corresponding haftarah. Tap any verse and you will hear it chanted while the corresponding words are highlighted on the screen. Once you are familiar with the content, swipe the screen to have the verses appear as they do in a Torah scroll, without vowels and musical notation. You can even adjust the font size and choose whether to display Hebrew only or Hebrew and English. Nine men and women share the duties of chanting from the Torah. [<http://bit.ly/torapp3>]

• Tanach Bible for iPhone, iPod Touch, and iPad ($1.99)

Hebrew and English text of Tanach are presented in parallel columns, Rashi and Hebrew text of Torah in parallel columns. There's also Hebrew search of text as well as the ability to bookmark and email verses. Inexpensive and full-featured, this app is highly recommended. [<http://bit.ly/torapp6>]

Alexander was 1986 Negev Dinner honoree

Moura Wolpert
Special to The C/JN

HAMILTON — Former lieutenant governor of Ontario Lincoln Alexander, who died Oct. 19 at age 90, was a good friend of the Hamilton Jewish community, which named him its JNF Negev Dinner honoree in 1986.

In an interview with The C/JN at his home in east Hamilton at the time, he recalled growing up as "a little black boy," determined not to be a railway porter like his father and encouraged by his mother to work hard. He attended McMaster University and later Osgoode Hall Law School, after service in the Royal Canadian Air Force during World War II.

Following several years with a local law firm, he entered politics in 1968 and was elected four times for the Progressive Conservative party in Hamilton West, where most of Hamilton's Jews were living at the time.

The first black MP, he served as minister of labour under Joe Clark. In 1980, following his retirement from politics, he was appointed chairman of the Workers Compensation Board of Ontario.

Modest and unassuming, the man who was affectionately known to everyone in Hamilton as "Linc," had a great sense of humour.

From now on, he told me shortly after his appointment as lieutenant governor of Ontario "you can no longer call me 'Linc.' Now you have to address me as 'Your Honour.'"

It didn't help. To his last day, he remained "Linc" to everyone in his adopted city.

Although born in Toronto, Alexander had lived in Hamilton ever since meeting his first wife, Yvonne, here. She died in 1999.

He is survived by his only son, Keith, and two granddaughters, as well as his second wife, Marni, whom he married in 2011.

Learning at every age

One of the basic things we should cultivate all through life is an unclosed mind. It has been said that "some minds are like concrete, all mixed up and permanently set."

To shut the windows of the mind is to court mental and spiritual suffocation. Leonardo da Vinci, who lived to a ripe old age and continued to paint masterpieces until the end, declared: "Learning keeps the soul young and decreases the bitterness of old age."

We can often retain our intellectual, spiritual and artistic faculties much longer than our physical faculties. When we reach a certain age, there are admittedly certain things that we cannot do as well as previously — those that call for speed or sustained exertion or quick learning. These things we can do much better when we are young.

On the other hand, there are some things we can do much better when we are older — matters that call for judgment, experience, discrimination, taste and wisdom.

We should continue learning and educating ourselves during the whole of our life span. The mind should be kept alert even when the body is slowing down.

Abraham Heschel wrote: "While we do not officially define old age as a second childhood, some of the programs we devise are highly effective in helping the aged to become juvenile. The preoccupation with games and hobbies, the over-emphasis on recreation, while certainly conducive to eliminating boredom temporarily, hardly contributes to inner strength. To be retired does not mean to be retarded."

Scientists maintain that it is possible to think creatively and make valuable contributions at practically every level of life. A recent analysis in a national magazine revealed that 60 per cent of the world's greatest achievements have been accomplished by men and women who have passed their 50th birthday — and that people between the ages of 70 and 80 are responsible for 20 per cent of the world's prime accomplishments.

Old age is no disgrace. Often, it's a time for new possibilities. Renowned Canadian physician William Osler declared: "No one ought to be alarmed when one's hair turns grey. If it turned green or blue, then one ought to see a doctor. But when it turns grey, that simply means there is so much grey matter in the skull that there is no longer room for it. It comes out and discolours the hair. Don't be ashamed of your grey — wear it proudly like a flag. You are fortunate in the world of so many vicissitudes to have lived long enough to earn it."

My father, who was an Orthodox rabbi, studied every day of his adult life, well into his retirement. He explained to me: "I don't want to forsake my books, they remain my loyal friends in my old age."

Project Heart criticized for lack of results

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

At 77, Jack Chivo is likely one of the youngest Holocaust survivors to have made a claim for property restitution through Project Heart.

As a youngster, he saw his family's factory in downtown Bucharest seized in a process of "Romanization" and the family forced to leave their comfortable apartment to live in an unheated cement basement, where his two-year-old sister died.

Chivo believes that as a matter of simple justice, his family should be compensated for the property that was seized. When Project Heart was launched by the government of Israel and the Jewish Agency for Israel in February 2011, he had hope that a mechanism would be put in place to aid survivors receive some measure of recompense.

But since he first filled out an online questionnaire setting out his claim, he's been terribly disappointed at the lack of progress in bringing his case to some sort of resolution.

Nothing has been done, he told The CJN in a telephone interview from his home in Vancouver. Project Heart seems to be spinning its wheels, making work for its employees but failing its mandate to assist the dwindling number of Holocaust survivors. When he contacts officials of the agency, he's been told that negotiations are going on behind the scenes – an explanation he's not buying.

Chivo, who worked for many years for the Voice of America, broadcasting into his native Romania, said he still has contacts in his homeland and no one – not senior officials of the local Jewish community, not others with their ears to the ground – have heard anything regarding negotiations to compensate Holocaust-era victims.

"Romania is the most corrupt country in Europe," he said. "Everybody has their own stool pigeons telling them what's going on. Nobody knows anything."

According to its website, Project Heart calls itself "the Holocaust Era Asset Restitution Taskforce. The purpose of Project Heart is to help individuals with restitution for property that was confiscated, looted, or forcibly sold during the era of the Shoah."

The site includes a three-minute video featuring Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, in which he repeats the assertion that basic justice requires restitution for seized property. He also notes that time is of the essence in pursuing these claims.

Anya Verkhovskaya, director of Project Heart, acknowledges Chivo's concerns and understands his impatience. "However, it's not a simple matter," she said. "It hasn't been resolved in 70 years and it won't be resolved in a few months. We're working as fast as we can."

Verkhovskaya, who is based in Milwaukee, said "country-to-country" negotiations are underway as Israel tries to convince European governments to put in place a process by which compensation will be made available.

But at that senior level, talks proceed slowly, she said, adding "we can't predict the future and we can't give people false promises." There is no way to predict whether a government will agree quickly to a protocol or drag its feet for years.

"We're completely aware of the issues," she said.

While talks continue, Project Heart has compiled a massive database detailing more than two million properties owned by Jews before the war – everything from real estate, businesses and residences to insurance policies, she said.

Verkhovskaya acknowledged that survivors may not benefit from the agency's efforts, but their heirs might.

Most of the 160,000 claims received by Project Heart were filed by the heirs of Holocaust survivors, she said.

The solution, when it comes, will likely vary country to country, requiring different processes in place, she added.

As for Chivo's claim, it encompasses "very complex issues."

However Chivo, who still runs his own brokerage business, said the way Project Heart has proceeded raises questions: "Why raise the expectations of Holocaust survivors?" he asked.

In addition, the way his claim was handled leads him to question how well Project Heart is fulfilling its mandate.

When he filled out his application, he was not able to save a copy to his own computer. (Verkhovskaya said he should have saved it before submitting it.)

He contacted the agency's Milwaukee office "at least 10 times asking for a copy of my application. When I received it finally, it was massaged. It was only a third of it. Somehow, the copying program was not working."

That led him to question how much of the information he had submitted was actually recorded by Project Heart. Without all the information, how could they proceed, he wondered.

Verkhovskaya said Project Heart has Chivo's entire application, but only a clipped version was printed out and returned to him.

Chivo said unlike other survivors, he's not in dire need of the money – he plans to give his share to charity – though his brother, who faces serious health issues, could certainly use his share.

As he tells his story, the Chivo family was fairly well-to-do in pre-war Romania. His grandparents owned a successful business in downtown Bucharest, which employed dozens of people. His family lived in an apartment next to the factory in a property owned by the business.

When Romania, an ally of the Nazis, implemented a process of "Romanization" – the local variation on Aryanization in which Jewish-owned property was seized and turned over to "pure Romanians for a song," his family lost everything, including their home, he said.

"Our family went from wealth to abject

A typical condominium in Bucharest, Romania poverty."

His father, who ran the business, was fired, and the family was forced to move into an unheated basement owned by a Greek who took pity on them. "It had cement floors, no hot water or sanitary facilities, and it was there that our baby sister died during a cold and vicious winter," Chivo stated.

Though his father was taken to a forced labour camp, he and Chivo's immediate family survived the war. Most of his extended family was wiped out. Chivo remained in Europe afterward, working for the Voice of America.

He moved to Canada in 1974. About 10 years ago, he returned to Bucharest to visit his old neighbourhood. The property has gone through a number of owners, he said, starting with Nazi sympathizers who lost it to postwar Communist ownership. Since the collapse of the Soviet Union, it has been owned by a number of European corporations. Today, the land is the site for 53 luxury condominiums along with three commercial buildings.

That, of course, complicates any effort to derive compensation: who should pay, the current owner, who acquired it in good faith, or the Romanian government?

Those are some of the questions that have to be ironed out in inter-government talks, said Verkhovskaya.

Boy hopes to raise $10,000 for SickKids

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A fundraiser complete with cotton candy, face painters, a silent auction and more, has been organized by an 11-year-old boy.

Inspired by his zaide, Zachary Winkler has been raising money for the SickKids Foundation for the past five years.

The first year, the family only sold cotton candy in their driveway and collected $500. But Zachary wanted to go bigger.

"I want to raise money until there are no kids who are sick," Zachary told his father, Richard, when he was six.

The next year they added a face painter, and each year, it has grown even more, with last year's event bringing in $8,250.

The sixth annual event, taking place Nov. 4 in Thornhill, Ont., will once again bring people to the Winklers' driveway, at 81 Ramblewood Lane. The party, which has grown to include three driveways, will ask people to participate through donating whatever they can.

In five years, the fundraiser has brought in almost $20,000.

Last year, to celebrate reaching a five-year milestone, Zachary wanted a celebrity guest, Winkler said. So Zachary called the Air Canada Centre and found himself a celebrity: Johnny Bower, a former goalie for the Toronto Maple Leafs.

"Every year, they're all his ideas and I just help him put it in to action," Winkler said.

Zachary does so much of the work, in addition to his schoolwork and social life, he said.

"I think he's the most incredible kid in the world," Winkler said. Of course, he's tied with his eight-year-old sister, Maya, who helps to hand out flyers and stickers at the event.

This year, Zachary is hoping to reach $10,000. And of course, once the event is finished, he'll want to aim higher, Winkler said. This year's main sponsor is K & S Party, Gift & Home (www.canadasstore.ca).

Wallenberg made honorary Montrealer

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A century after he was born, Raoul Wallenberg was posthumously made an honorary citizen of Montreal last week in a city hall ceremony witnessed by a few of the tens of thousands of people who owe their life to the Swedish diplomat.

Mayor Gerald Tremblay was uncharacteristically emotional after listening to the testimony of Agnes (Lörcinzi) Kent, one of the Hungarian Jews Wallenberg rescued. Now 84 and living in Montreal, Kent and her mother survived thanks to being sheltered in 1944 in one of the 32 "safe" houses Wallenberg set up in Budapest.

They lived, but the young Kent was not spared from listening to the hellish noise of countless other Jews being executed on the banks of the Danube River nearby, nor from the death of her deported father.

The rare honour of citizenship was extended by the city as part of the commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Wallenberg's birth, and as a highlight of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre's (MHMC) annual Holocaust Education Series, which continues until Nov. 4. The theme this year is "The Righteous," and focuses on those who came to the aid of Jews during World War II.

When it comes to the vital responsibility of building Jewish identity, caring for our most vulnerable, and standing with the people of Israel, it takes a very special group of people.

It takes the commitment of individuals from a myriad of backgrounds and points of view, but all of whom share a common bond with the Jewish People in Toronto, Israel and around the world.

'Daughter of Calabria' describes Jewish journey

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It's one of the great oddities in the Jewish name game that those who bear the name "Porco" are likely Jews, as are other Italian families with surnames such as Sacerdoti, Mascaro, Pugliesi, Taverna, Grande, Russo and Aiello.

Sacerdoti, Italian for priest, was the name given long ago to Jews with the family name Cohen, which in Hebrew translates as priest.

Porco, which refers to an unkosher animal, was given to Jews by Inquisitors as an insult. Many who bore that name subsequently changed it to the less offensive "Porto," said Rabbi Barbara Aiello.

The name Aiello itself is an ancient Jewish one that translates as up to God, she said. Rabbi Aiello, whose family immigrated to the United States from Calabria, counts herself among those descended from Italian crypto-Jews, or hidden Jews. Rabbi Aiello was in Toronto Oct. 28 as a guest of Congregation Darchei Noam. She discussed the lost Jews of Calabria and her journey to reclaim her Jewish heritage.

Rabbi Aiello was born in Pittsburgh and currently serves as rabbi for a Jewish seniors home in Sarasota, Fla. She spends much of the summer in Italy, where as "a daughter of Calabria," she assists people in southern Italy reclaim their Jewish roots.

It's a little-known fact that prior to the Inquisition 500 years ago, as much as 40 per cent of the population of Sicily and Calabria – the toe of the Italian boot – were Jews. Rabbi Aiello said in a telephone interview prior to her appearance in Toronto. They were involved in commerce, particularly the silk trade, as well as in selling leather goods, bamboo and paper.

At the time, Sicily as well as southern Italy up to Naples was part of the kingdom of Spain. When the order came for Jews to convert or leave Spain, many escaped to southern Italy, which already may have been as much as 40 per cent Jewish. When the Inquisition reached that region, some moved to isolated villages in the mountains, where they could live in safety as hidden Jews, or anusim, literally the lost ones.

Her own family, she pointed out, lived in a town established in the mountains by five Jewish families generations ago.

Jews remained hidden for generations. Her family never became Catholic and did not abandon Judaism. Her great-grandfather travelled to Montreal a few times. She speculates he did so to study Judaism and bring back the knowledge to his community. When they finally moved to the United States, her father was stunned to see Jews openly practise their faith, she said.

As she explored her Calabrian roots, Rabbi Aiello, Italy's first female rabbi, found examples of Jewish traditions everywhere. She found low chairs used when sitting in mourning for the departed. She found people, without knowing why, discarding an egg if it had a red spot, according to the rules of kashrut. Rabbi Aiello said that during her sojourns in Italy, people constantly approach her with stories indicating their Jewish roots. One woman told her of her grandmother who on her deathbed said she did not wear a rosary or a priest because she was Jewish.

That revelation surprised her family, Rabbi Aiello said. "A young man brought me a yad [a pointing device shaped like a hand that's used when reading the Torah] and said his grandfather gave it to him. 'What is it? I thought it might be Jewish,'" she recounted him saying.

Rabbi Aiello said she helps Italians who wish to reconnect with their Jewish past. Synagoga Ner Tamid del Sud (Synagogue of the Eternal Light of the South), the first active synagogue in Calabria and Sicily in 500 years, was opened in 2007 in Serrastretta, her family's home in Calabria.

At a bar mitzvah service this past July, "people came from mountain towns and I was mobbed. I spoke, the mayor spoke saying he was so grateful for the Jews to return."

So far, 53 people have converted back to Judaism.

One instance of a mass conversion to Judaism took place during World War II and is highlighted in a film that will air on the CBC Documentary Channel on Nov. 18.

Titled The Mystery of San Nicandro, the documentary tells the story of a group of Roman Catholics who converted to Judaism in fascist Italy. In 1949, 80 of them moved to Israel. Their descendants who remained in San Nicandro underwent formal conversion in 2011.

Rabbi Aiello said hundreds of Calabrians and Sicilians have approached her in recent years, suspecting they are descended from Jews and eager to learn more about their heritage.

"I help them reclaim their Jewish roots taken by the Inquisition," she said.

Rabbi Barbara Aiello.

'I've always been a supporter of Israel's right to exist'

Rushdie called this event unique at the time, in that it was what he calls the first "extraterritorial" death edict against an author.

"Writers have often been persecuted in their own countries by their own governments. But the thing that was different about [the fatwa] was that finger-pointing across the world backed up by death squads," he said.

In 2002, Rushdie, who had been living under the assumed name of Joseph Anton – or "Joe" as he was called by the numerous security details assigned to protect him – was finally told he could come out of the shadows and live a free life once more, as the British Secret Intelligence Service lowered the threat assessment on his life.

He said it took him a decade to be able to write the book and that it was one of the more difficult manuscripts he's ever worked on.

"It was the last thing in the world I wanted to write about" for the longest time, Rushdie said, referring to constant requests by publishers for him to write a tell-all book about his life in hiding. "I just wanted to slam the door on that period of my life and just go forward."

He said he was finally able to write the story once he'd gotten enough distance from that part of his life.

In fact, the book is written in the third person specifically because to Rushdie, it now seems like those events happened to someone who no longer exists.

"I came to feel that the me I was writing about... I'm no longer exactly that person," he said. "Myself as a subject in the book is not exactly the same person writing it."

Using the third person also helped him write the book as a novel instead of a first-person memoir.

"In a first person autobiography, the 'I' feels apart from all the other characters. In the third person, he becomes part of all the other characters. I liked the feeling of that."

He said that these days, he feels "lighter" and more "unburdened" than he has in years, and that writing this book as lifted a great weight from him.

While the death threats and danger to him and his family have disappeared, the only remnant of the clandestine life he was forced to lead is that there are still places in the world he can't visit.

"Basically, I doubt I'll ever be able to visit [most] Muslim countries," he said.

Asked if during his years in hiding he felt like a symbol of resistance to the forces of radical Islam, Rushdie said he never conceived of his life that way.

'It was the last thing in the world I wanted to write about. I just wanted to slam the door on that period of my life and just go forward.'

"I don't feel symbolic, and I always worried about that whole iconic thing. In a way, one of the things I felt writing Joseph Anton were that there were these portraits of me both by friends and enemies that didn't feel like me. There was a demonized me by those attacking me and there was this idealized me... that was being put out by my supporters. And I thought 'I'm not the Statue of Liberty any more than I'm the devil.' And writing this novel was aimed at presenting the non-stylized version of me. Here's the actual person. Not the shining light and also not the black rogue. Just a human being in the middle."

Speaking about his thoughts on what has been described as the clash between the West and the Muslim world, Rushdie said he's more interested these days in what's happening inside Muslim countries, given the Arab Spring and other recent changes.

"Obviously there is this kind of Islam that feels itself to be at war with the idea of the West, and there's a kind of western political mindset that believes itself to be at war with a kind of Islam.

SALMAN RUSHDIE

JOSEPH ANTON

"But I think what's more important, in a way, is the battle that's happening inside Muslim countries, which is a battle for the future. Clearly there is a problem about modernity in the Muslim world. How do you live in the modern world? And I think most of those countries have failed to answer that question properly and are trying to hold onto a worldview that hamstringing them because of these stupid medieval restraints imposed on their populations."

Rushdie said that whether it be via intimidation or apathy, in general, citizens of Muslim countries are allowing extremists to define their lives.

"Some of us try to make the distinction between the mass of ordinary Muslims and the fanatics. It's getting harder to make that distinction and [stopping this trend] can't be done from the outside. It's up to Muslims to reject that," he said.

Rushdie, an agnostic, said he never saw himself as a writer about religion.

"I'm not interested in religion. To me it's a waste of time."

As for what's next on his writing agenda, Rushdie said he has some ideas about a new novel, and he's developing an idea for a "crazy science fiction series" for the Showtime Network in the United States.

However, all the travel promoting his new book and his work with the launch of the film adaptation of his 1980 novel Midnight's Children – which opens this Friday across Canada – has him longing for solitude.

"There's a part of me that is really anxious to go sit in a corner for a couple of years and make up" a new novel, he said.

"I think I need to get back to my day job – fiction."

It's a topsy-turvy world in today's Middle East

The Middle East is in chaos. The old order of mainly secular autocracies is dissolving and a new order is emerging with Islamists in control. However, there is great concern about whether burgeoning Arab populations will experience any greater degree of freedom, equality and economic improvement – factors that motivated revolts throughout the Arab world in the first place.

The assumption of many pundits that the "Arab Spring" would usher in an era of liberal eral democracy has been shattered by the growing dominance of illiberal Islamists led foremost by the Muslim Brotherhood and its offshoots such as Hamas. They, in turn, are being challenged by more extreme Salafists. Small pockets of liberals are under siege and threatened with irrelevance from large segments of the populace who overwhelmingly don't share their secular values. This is certainly true in Egypt, a country of 85 million people, but it's also increasingly the case even in European-influenced Tunisia, a country of 11 million. The situation in Libya is arguably more problematic, as regional and tribal-based militias continue to dominate their local regions, despite efforts by the western-backed central government to assert its authority.

Meanwhile, as Syria tears itself apart in a civil war, its former partner, Turkey, which had also in the past few years grown close to Syria's principal backer, Iran, has shifted strongly away from both. It's now forging closer ties with Egypt to form a strong Sunni-led bloc against the Shia axis consisting of Iran, Syria and Hezbollah.

The recent car-bomb assassination in Beirut of Wissam al-Hassan, the Sunni Lebanese general who was a staunch critic of the Assad regime, is widely considered to be the work of Syria, even if carried out once again by Hezbollah. Al-Hassan had been a leading voice calling for justice in another car-bombing assassination case involving Hezbollah and Syria – the 2005 murder of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri. A UN special tribunal issued indictments of four Hezbollah members, although no one has been prosecuted or is likely to be.

Now there's deep concern that as Syria unravels and Hezbollah fights on both sides of the border to prop up Assad and help save Iran's influence in the region, Lebanon itself could become destabilized. No wonder the news media are hard pressed to keep up with all the changes.

In their Nov. 8 New York Review of Books article, "This Is Not a Revolution," Hussein Agha and Robert Malley provide an overview, rich in paradox and irony, of these dizzying developments:

"Alliances are topsy-turvy, defy logic, [and] are unfamiliar and shifting. Theocratic regimes back secularists; tyrannies promote democracy; the U.S. forms partnerships with Islamists; Islamists support western military intervention. Arab nationalists side with regimes they have long combated; liberals side with Islamists with whom they then come to blows. Saudi Arabia backs secularists against the Muslim Brothers and Salafis against secularists. The U.S. is allied with Iraq, which is allied with Iran, which supports the Syrian regime, which the U.S. hopes to help topple. The U.S. is also allied with Qatar, which subsidizes Hamas, and with Saudi Arabia, which funds the Salafis who inspire jihadists who kill Americans wherever they can."

In the meantime, on Oct. 23, the Emir of Qatar visited the Hamas leadership in Gaza, pledging $400 million for housing and infrastructure development.

The Jerusalem Post's Khaled Abu Toameh called his visit "a huge political and moral victory for Hamas. [It] marks the beginning of the end of years of isolation for Hamas, particularly in the international arena."

Just a day after the Emir left Gaza, Israel was struck by nearly 80 rockets and mortars, many of them launched by Hamas. As Abu Toameh noted, "now that Hamas has the backing – and financial support – of a wealthy and influential country like Qatar, it can afford to do almost anything it wants." It addition to being emboldened, Hamas calculated that Israel will be hesitant to retaliate with the sort of force that could further erode its already-shaky relations with Egypt.

Wanda's Lists: Holocaust Education Week 2012 Children Without A Name

A documentary about one of the most miraculous events of the Holocaust

Directed by award winning Israeli filmmaker Vered Berman

Wanda Sokolowska, a Jewish woman from Warsaw, rescued hundreds of Jewish children during the Holocaust by hiding them with Polish families or in monasteries. Many of the children never knew their original names, the identity of their parents or their Polish rescuers. Fifty years later we join them on their search for their roots and identities.

Sometimes what they find out, is nothing short of a miracle.

MP defends riding's boundaries

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler spoke out against the elimination of that federal riding during public hearings on the planned reorganization of the country's electoral map. He says Mount Royal should remain as it is.

Noting that 36 per cent of the population of Mount Royal is Jewish, Cotler said on Oct. 19 that the proposed changes "dramatically undermine the community of interest and identity," one of the criteria that the law stipulates should be considered when drawing electoral district boundaries.

Circumcision benefits outweigh risks: U.S. body

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

The American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) has recently updated its position on infant circumcision, saying "the health benefits of newborn male circumcision outweigh the risks," and the Canadian Paediatric Society (CPS), the corresponding organization in this country, may follow in the months to come.

The AAP's previous policy had identified only "potential" health benefits. The revised policy is based on a survey of medical literature that found definite preventative and public health benefits.

The task force evaluated new studies on HIV acquisition and found that circumcised heterosexual men are less likely to acquire the disease from infected female partners than uncircumcised men are.

According to one statement by the World Health Organization (WHO), circumcision "reduces the risk of female-to-male sexual transmission of HIV by approximately 60 per cent."

In priority regions of Africa, the WHO has initiated a five-year voluntary circumcision campaign, with a goal of an 80 per cent circumcision rate among adult men and infants. It hopes to reduce new HIV infections by 50 per cent by 2015.

Circumcision may also help prevent syphilis. On the other hand, the AAP task force found no connection between circumcision and rates of chlamydia and gonorrhea, the two most common sexually transmitted infections (STIs) in the United States. Another area where circumcision probably doesn't help is penile cancer, which is declining worldwide anyway, says the AAP, regardless of the rate of circumcision in various countries.

However, circumcised boys are much less likely to develop urinary-tract infections (UTIs), the AAP notes. "The majority of UTIs in males occur during the first year of life. In children, UTIs usually necessitate a physician visit and may involve the possibility of an invasive procedure and hospitalization."

Boys and men aren't the only ones who benefit. There's evidence that their female partners are protected as well from conditions such as bacterial vaginosis and human papillomavirus (HPV), one of the most common STIs in the United States, which can also lead to cervical cancer.

UJA Federation is Everywhere

With over 100 partner agencies and schools, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's reach is farther than you might realize.

For example, did you know that teachers and students in more than 400 Israeli classrooms are thinking smart these days thanks to a donation from Toronto philanthropist Seymour Schulich, which, funded through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, created The Schulich Canada Smart Classroom Initiative.

UJA Federation partnered with World ORT, the leading Jewish non-governmental organization specializing in cutting-edge education and vocational training, and, as a result, some 40,000 students have been provided with laptop computers connected wirelessly to the teacher's workstation and an electronic whiteboard at the front of the class.

This new, pioneering classroom technology will allow teachers in 411 Israeli classrooms to integrate sound, animation, video, live web content and text in an interactive fashion.

Procedure may reduce chance of disease

A 2002 study in the New England Journal of Medicine also found a small "protective effect" against cervical cancer for female partners of circumcised men.

Dr. Neil Pollock, a Vancouver doctor who specializes in circumcision, explains that the foreskin's inner lining can act as an entry point for viruses that cause STIs, such as HIV, HPV and herpes, or bacteria such as E. coli, which cause urinary tract infections.

"When you remove the foreskin, you remove that entry point into the body."

The AAP says the foreskin may also "trap" these "pathogens and secretions and favour their survival and replication."

While it still doesn't endorse routine circumcision, the AAP now recommends reimbursement from insurers if parents opt for the procedure. In Canada, routine circumcision isn't funded by government medicare. In Ontario, it was delisted in 1994.

The current CPS position, updated in 1996, says that "evidence of the benefits and harms of circumcision is so evenly balanced that it does not support recommending [newborn] circumcision as a routine procedure."

"We expect to release a revised statement in six to 12 months, but until then our current position stands," a CPS spokesperson told The CJA.

Pollock says that "prior positions by the CPS viewed risks and benefits as more evenly balanced... their new position may be much more supportive."

A 1975 CPS statement referred to circumcision as an "obsolete operation," though this language was omitted in recent documents.

Newborn circumcision offers far lower rates of complications such as bleeding and infection than when it's done later in life, Pollock says. "The procedure [on a newborn] can be comfortably and painlessly done by skilled doctors using local anesthetic," instead of a hospital stay and general anesthetic for an adult.

Both the CPS and the AAP emphasize pain relief. The new AAP statement says "[n]onpharmacologic techniques (e.g., positioning, sucrose pacifiers) alone" can't prevent pain, and it recommends better educational materials to help parents make the decision. Anti-circumcision forces have rallied against the AAP statement. Dr. Christopher Guest, a Barrie radiologist who co-founded the Children's Health and Human Rights Partnership, dedicated to "ending non-therapeutic genital surgery on children in Canada," calls the AAP's evidence "selective," using trials that "reveal a number of methodological weaknesses."

Others argue that STI-related health benefits only apply to developing nations.

Guest also believes that the AAP "fails to recognize the sensory and mechanical function of the human foreskin."

However, the AAP task force found "no statistically significant differences... between circumcised and uncircumcised men in terms of sexual sensation and satisfaction," and said that "sexual function is not adversely affected."

The AAP recommends finding providers with adequate training and sterile techniques, and avoiding "mouth-to-penis contact during circumcision," a wound-clearing practice known as metzitzah b'peh that is used mainly among haredim. Pollock believes that "after this strong support... by the AAP - which only came after careful review of thousands of recently published scientific papers - it would be very difficult for the CPS to adopt anything but a more supportive stance."

Will new evidence change anything for the Jewish community?

"Yes and no," Pollock says.

"We always did this [circumcision] as a sign of the covenant between God and the Jewish people... however, [the AAP statement] makes it harder for the secular world to pressure us to cease our customs - as was done recently by a German court - when the world discovers that what we have been practising... for religious reasons makes great medical sense as well."

World must stop Iran, says advocacy expert

Sammy Hudes
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Stopping Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons is an issue facing not only Israel, but the entire world in the coming year. Israeli advocacy expert Neil Lazarus told 30 students at Carleton University last week.

Lazarus, who lives in Israel, is an internationally acclaimed expert in Middle East politics, public diplomacy and effective communication training.

He led a seminar Oct. 24 on the Iranian nuclear threat while in Canada on a university speaking tour that also included a presentation in Toronto. The Carleton event was organized by Ottawa's Israel Awareness Committee (IAC).

Lazarus challenged the students to change their perceptions of the Middle East, noting that it's important to view the Iranian nuclear threat or any other crisis in the region from a broad perspective.

"How to stop a country – which sees itself at war with the West and at the same time calls for the destruction of the 'Zionist entity' – from getting the capability of doing so poses the question which the world has to face for 2013," he said in his presentation.

"An attack on Iran may set them back only two to three years," Lazarus said. "Then what? Any attack on Iranian nuclear sites either by Israel or America would with all certainty lead to some sort of regional conflict. You would have Iran responding and attacking Israel, and its allies would join in, which includes Hezbollah."

The threat posed by Hezbollah may be even graver than that of a nuclear Iran itself, due to the thousands of rockets that Hezbollah can now launch into Israel in under a minute, Lazarus said.

He emphasized that the Iranian threat can't only be evaluated from an Israeli perspective, but must also be viewed in terms of its effect on the entire Middle East and the rest of the world.

"What's happening now in the Middle East is so dramatic, it will change the very nature of global politics," Lazarus said. "One of the issues of Iran becoming a nuclear country is that a nuclear Iran threatens the hegemony of America in the Middle East."

Lazarus touched on the effects of the Arab Spring, which he described as less of a move toward democracy, as it's often portrayed, but rather more about the toppling of dictators, many of whom were supported by western powers.

"The irony is, as the Middle East becomes more democratic through the Arab Spring, it's actually becoming anti-western in many ways," said Lazarus, arguing that if democracy is to succeed, politics must be seen as "the compromise between ideology and pragmatism."

IAC citywide president Zane Colt said this was the second straight year Lazarus has visited Carleton, and his message helps promote dialogue on campus.

"[Our goal] is making the dialogue surrounding Israel not scary or taboo," Colt said. "We're allowed to have dialogue, to challenge and be critical. We welcome it."

Course unites Jewish, Muslim women

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A new weekly course is bringing together Jewish and Muslim women to study each other's spiritual texts and the roles of women in these religions.

Shari Golberg and Nevin Reda lead the course, which focuses on different aspects of the religions each week. Golberg is a PhD student and Reda teaches Muslim studies at Emmanuel College at the University of Toronto's downtown campus. Together, they teach students about various aspects of Judaism and Islam.

"I've always loved the experience of reading texts in this type of environment where Muslims, Jews and occasionally Christians come together to read the text," Reda said, explaining that these types of classes bring texts to life.

To emphasize the course's goal, the classes are being held in three different venues – the first three at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, the next three at the Noor Cultural Centre in Don Mills, and the final class at U of T's Multi-Faith Centre for Spiritual Study and Practice.

"The rotation was done on purpose so people can get a sense of what the inside of one another's houses look like," Golberg said.

The course has its roots in a group Golberg put together in 2004 called "When Beruriah Met Aisha," referring to two female religious authorities, one Jewish and one Muslim.

"Wouldn't it be interesting if these two women could have had an opportunity to dialogue with one another?" Golberg said, joking that since they lived at different times in history, it would require collapsing the time-space continuum.

Instead, she organized the next best thing: bringing their descendants, Jewish and Muslim women, together to explore the religions and women's roles in them.

Some of the topics to be covered include female leadership, modesty laws, marriage and divorce, and depictions of each other's religions in their respective texts.

Reda said the class will examine similarities and differences between the two faiths. For example, there are similarities regarding menstruation, such as women not being allowed to participate in some prayers, read the Torah or touch the Qur'an while menstruating, Reda said.

However, they differ in the rituals used to "purify" women after their period ends, Reda said.

More than 20 women have enrolled in the course, which began Oct. 18 and runs for seven weeks on Thursdays. It's open to all ages, with a discount for women from 18 to 30.

Paper claims Israel struck Sudan weapons factory

Gabe Fisher and Ilan Ben Zion
 The Times of Israel

An Israel airstrike was behind the explosion last Wednesday at a Sudanese weapons factory, and that attack was a "dry run for a forthcoming attack on Iran's nuclear facilities," according to a weekend report in the Sunday Times of London.

The report also implied that the seeds of the attack were planted in the 2010 alleged Mossad assassination of Hamas operative Mahmoud Mabhouth in Dubai.

Citing anonymous Israeli and western defence sources, the British newspaper alleged that eight Israeli Air Force fighter planes, two helicopters and a refuelling plane were used in the attack on the weapons factory near Khartoum. The force flew down the Red Sea, avoiding Egyptian air defence, and used electronic countermeasures to prevent detection while over Sudanese territory.

Four fighters made the bombing run, the other four were used for air cover, while the helicopters, which carried 10 commandos each, were in reserve in case a rescue operation was needed to recover a downed pilot.

"This was a show of force, but it was only a fraction of our capability – and of what the Iranians can expect in the countdown to the spring," an Israeli defence source was quoted as telling the Sunday Times.

Israeli officials have neither confirmed nor denied striking the site. Instead, they accused Sudan of playing a role in an Iranian-backed network of arms shipments to Hamas and Hezbollah. Israel believes Sudan is a key transit point in the circuitous route that weapons take to the Islamic militant groups in the Gaza Strip and Lebanon.

The Sudanese government last Wednesday immediately pointed the finger at Israel for the fire at the Yarmouk Complex that killed two people, saying that four Israeli aircraft bombed the factory.

On Saturday, Khartoum claimed it had proof of Israeli involvement. Sudan said 60 per cent of the factory was completely destroyed in the attack and the rest badly damaged.

Sudanese officials said the government has the right to respond to what the information minister said was a "flagrant attack" by Israel on Sudan's sovereignty, and the right to strengthen its military capabilities.

An American monitoring group said

on Saturday that satellite images of the aftermath of the Wednesday explosion suggested the site was hit by an airstrike. The images released by the Satellite Sentinel Project to the Associated Press showed six 16-metre-wide craters at the compound.

Military experts consulted by the project found the craters to be "consistent with large impact craters created by air-delivered munitions," Satellite Sentinel Project spokesperson Jonathan Hutson said.

The target may have been some 40 shipping containers seen at the site in earlier images, the group said. It said the craters centre on the area where the containers had been stacked.

Sudan was a major hub for Al Qaeda militants and remains a transit for weapons smugglers and African migrant traffickers. Israeli officials believe arms that originate in the Iranian port of Bandar Abbas go through Sudan before crossing Egypt's lawless Sinai desert and into Gaza through underground tunnels.

According to the Sunday Times, in 2010 when Mossad agents assassinated Hamas arms procurer Mabhouth in Dubai, they found a copy of a 2008 defence agreement between Iran and Sudan.

The agreement allowed Iran to build weapons in Sudan under Iranian supervision. The Times wrote that the "Israelis discovered later that a large contingent of Iranian technicians had been sent to the Yarmouk factory... the Iranians were building advanced Shahab ballistic missiles and rockets at a plant in the factory compound."

These missiles were seen as "a direct threat," according to an Israeli security expert quoted by the Times.

Opened in 1996, the Yarmouk factory is one of two known state-owned weapons manufacturing plants in the Sudanese capital. Sudan prided itself on having a way to produce its own ammunition and weapons despite United Nations and U.S. sanctions.

The satellite images indicate that the Yarmouk facility includes an oil storage facility, a military depot and an ammunition plant.

The monitoring group said the images indicate that the blast "destroyed two buildings and heavily damaged at least 21 others," adding that there was no indication of fire damage at the fuel depot inside the military complex.

The group said it could not be certain the containers, seen in images taken Oct. 12, were still there when explosion took place. But the effects of the blast suggested a "highly volatile cargo" was at the epicentre of the explosion.

"If the explosions resulted from a rocket or missile attack against material stored in the shipping containers, then it was an effective surgical strike that totally destroyed any container" that was at the location, the project said.

A witness told the project that three planes were seen "flying fast around southern Khartoum, to the northwest and northeast," while a fourth larger plane flew toward the northeast at a higher altitude.

Yarmouk is located in a densely populated residential area of the city approximately 11 kilometres southwest of the Khartoum International Airport.

Wednesday's blast sent exploding ammunition flying into homes in the neighbourhood adjacent to the factory, causing panic among residents. Sudanese officials said some people suffered from smoke inhalation.

A man who lives near the factory said that, from inside their house, he and his brother heard a loud roar – what they believed was a plane – just before the boom of the explosion sounded from the factory.

Also on Saturday, a report in the Examiner quoted an "Israeli counterterrorism source" saying Israel bombed the Sudanese munitions plant, which has also produced chemical weapons.

The Examiner's source claimed that "the Israeli government reported to news reporters that four Israeli military planes attacked and destroyed the arms factory in Khartoum."

Contrary to the Examiner report, Jerusalem has been tight-lipped since Khartoum. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last Thursday had no comment about the incident. Defence Minister Ehud Barak told Channel 2 there was "nothing to say" about the subject.

The Examiner's source reiterated the charge made in the Israeli press and by the Sunday Times that Sudanese-made arms funded by Iran make their way to Hamas and Hezbollah armories. The article claimed that Iran pays Bedouin to smuggle Sudanese arms from the Red Sea coast across Sinai to the Gaza Strip.

According to the Examiner's Israeli source, "hundreds of rockets (mostly with ranges of 20 to 40 kilometres), about 1,000 mortar shells, dozens of individual anti-tank missiles, and tons of explosives and explosives-making materials have been smuggled" via Sinai to the Gaza Strip.

South Africa's ruling party endorses anti-Israel boycott

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

Senior members of South Africa's ruling party last week endorsed a boycott of Israel, seemingly contradicting Pretoria's official stance of maintaining trade ties with Israel.

The move is likely to further strain already frayed ties between the countries.

During an international conference hosted by the African National Congress — which controls two thirds of the National Assembly — delegates endorsed the anti-Israel Boycott, Sanctions and Divestment movement. According to a press release by the South African BDS chapter, there was "wide-spread support from international delegates for the adoption and support of the Palestinian BDS call."

Responding to an objection from a German delegate, who said Israel cannot be compared to South Africa during the apartheid era, ANC chairperson and former South African deputy president Baleka Mbete said Israel was actually "far worse than apartheid South Africa," according to a press release published by BDS South Africa. "Ms Mbete received a resounding round of applause from delegates for articulating this position," the release states.

The Palestine Liberation Organization official who was present at the conference welcomed the ANC's support for BDS.

In Jerusalem, the Foreign Ministry reacted angrily. "The government of South Africa has stated time and again that it is against boycotts," Foreign Ministry spokesman Yigal Palmor told the Times of Israel in response to the announcement. "This release being a hodgepodge of half-truths and entire lies serving as arguments to recommend a policy rejected by the South African government, we're waiting for South African officials to respond and clarify the official position."

The president of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, Zeev Krengel, said Mbete's statement was the usual attempt to "bash and demonize Israel."

"It is disappointing for Jewish people in South Africa as this adds no value but to incite a level of anti-Israel feeling," Krengel said, according to local newspaper the Citizen. Jerusalem is beginning to think the government in Pretoria is as hostile toward Israel as the Iranian regime. Krengel was quoted as saying,

Egypt seizes Jewish ownership documents in Cairo

Elhanan Miller
The Times of Israel

Egyptian authorities confiscated some 1.7 million documents reportedly proving Jewish ownership of land and assets in Cairo.

The documents were reportedly about to be shipped out of the country to Israel, in what the Egyptian daily Al-Ahram called "the most dangerous case of security breach in history."

The documents were found in 13 large cases, ready to be transported to Jordan and from there to Israel, Egyptian media reported Sunday.

Elaph, a Saudi-owned news site, reported that Egyptian police received notice that the packages were being held at a shipping company in the Nasser City district of Cairo. Upon arriving at the scene, police found more than 1.7 million documents dating back to the 19th century, dealing with Jewish ownership of assets in Cairo. The documents, according to the security source speaking to the Saudi site, weighed more than two tons.

Preliminary investigations have revealed that the documents were supposed to be used in an Israeli lawsuit involving Jewish property lost in Egypt's 1952 revolution, the site reported. According to Elaph, Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi is personally following the case, which it said affects Egypt's national security.

The documents were reportedly stolen on Dec. 16, 2011, from a Cairo research institution, the Institut d'Égypte, during public riots that erupted following president Hosni Mubarak's ouster.

According to Al-Ahram, an unnamed senior member of former Mubarak's National Democratic Party (NDP) was involved in the efforts to smuggle the documents out of the country, in the service of a French-Jewish woman. Another man implicated by Al-Ahram is a Jewish Lebanese businessman named Robert Khalil Sarsaq, who also holds other nationalities. Elaph's source claimed that the two are suspected of having ties with the Mossad.

The source noted that some of the documents — containing Jewish ownership deeds for banks, companies and real estate — date back to 1863. The documents are now being held by Egypt's general prosecution.

Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon recently launched a campaign encouraging Jewish refugees from Arab states to come forward and present testimonials of the circumstances that led them to flee their countries of origin.

Egypt's Jewish community numbered some 75,000 before the founding of Israel in 1948. By 1957, only several thousand Jews were left in the country. Most of the others had fled under Arab pressure, according to contemporary accounts.

In 2009, the government of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu established a national advisory council to examine Jewish claims of lost property in Arab countries, but the council was moved from the Justice Ministry to the Pensioners Affairs Ministry and did little to register property claims.

Protocols read aloud in Greek parliament

JTA

ATHENS — A lawmaker for Greece's neo-Nazi Golden Dawn Party has reportedly read out in parliament a passage from the antisemitic forgery The Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

Ilias Kasidiaris, a spokesperson for Golden Dawn, read out Protocol 19 from the book: "In order to destroy the prestige of heroism, we shall send them for trial in the category of theft, murder and every kind of abominable and filthy crime," according to Panayote Dimitras of the Greek Helsinki Monitor.

Kasidiaris was addressing parliament Oct. 23 at a discussion on lifting his immunity in connection with suspicions of assault. "There was absolutely no reaction" to this in parliament, Dimitras said, which, makes "all parties held as accomplices."

In a written statement, the Foreign Affairs Network of B'nai Brith Europe called the manuscript's reading in a European Union parliament "a sign of moral corruption and degradation which must not be overlooked." The silence with which the reading was received was "doubly worrisome," the network wrote in its statement.

In June, Kasidiaris slapped female politician Liana Kanelli three times on the head during a television discussion. He was subsequently locked in a room in the studio, but he knocked down the door and escaped.

Canada, U.S. slam UN official

Yoel Goldman
The Times of Israel

Canada joined Israel and the United States in calling for the removal of the United Nations special investigator on human rights in the Palestinian territories after he presented a report last week calling for a boycott of all companies that have dealings with Israeli settlements in the West Bank and east Jerusalem until they adhere to international rights standards and practices.

A spokesperson for Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird condemned Richard Falk's Oct. 25 report.

"Canada calls on Mr. Falk to either withdraw this biased and disgraceful report or resign from his position at the United Nations," Rick Roth wrote in an email obtained by CBC News.

"The latest report by the United Nations special rapporteur for the Palestinian territories is both offensive and unhelpful, but not overly surprising. Richard Falk has a long history of making outrageous statements, and frankly, has only tarnished the reputation and integrity of the United Nations," Roth said later in a statement.

"His comments by no means represent the position of the government of Canada. Canada has been clear that any unilateral action is ultimately unhelpful to a just and lasting peace for Israel and the Palestinians," Roth said.

"Mr. Falk has not only done a disservice to the United Nations, but also to the Palestinian people," he added.

Israel and the United States also rushed to reject Falk's report, accusing the UN special rapporteur of bias against Israel and calling for his removal.

Israel's UN Mission called the report "grossly biased" and called for Falk to be replaced.

"Israel is deeply committed to advancing human rights and firmly believes that this cause will be better served without Falk and his distasteful sideshow," said Karean Peretz, a spokesperson for the Israeli UN mission. "While he spends pages and pages attacking Israel, Falk fails to mention even once the horrific human rights violations and ongoing terrorist attacks by Hamas."

U.S. Ambassador Susan Rice called Falk "highly biased" and his appeal for a boycott "irresponsible and unacceptable."

"Mr. Falk's recommendations do nothing to further a peaceful settlement to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and indeed poison the environment for peace," she said in a statement. "His continued service in the role of a UN special rapporteur is deeply regrettable and only damages the credibility of the UN."

In his report, presented to the UN General Assembly, Falk said a number of Israeli-owned and multinational corporations headquartered in the United States, Europe and Mexico appear to be violating international human rights and humanitarian laws by exploiting Palestinian resources and helping Israel construct illegal settlements and provide security for them. However, he said further investigations will be made to determine whether the allegations are well-founded. Falk said the call for a boycott is an effort to take infractions of international law seriously and "use what influence we have to change behaviour." Falk, an American professor emeritus of international law at Princeton University, has previously angered Israel by comparing the Jewish state to Nazi Germany and accusing it of crimes against humanity because of its treatment of Palestinians. Israel has barred Falk from visiting the Palestinian territories.

In his report, Falk reiterated his request that the Israeli government co-operate with his efforts, as he said it's required to do under the UN Charter.

The Anti-Defamation League called on UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon to rescind his preliminary endorsement of the report and to distance his office from Falk, who was appointed by the UN Human Rights Council.

No secret pacts

Yisrael Beiteinu has denied reports that party leader Avigdor Lieberman would become prime minister under a secret pact between his movement and Likud. "There is no pact for rotation in the role of prime minister," Yisrael Beiteinu chairperson Faina Kirschenbaum told Channel 10 News in reaction to an earlier report that the newly announced merger between Likud and Yisrael Beiteinu stipulated that if the merged list wins the elections, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Likud would step down mid-term and be replaced as prime minister by Lieberman, who is currently Israel's foreign minister. Kirschenbaum added: "Under the new agreement with Likud, Lieberman can choose any portfolio he likes."

Italy, Israel summit

Italian Prime Minister Mario Monti and a high-level delegation of government ministers and businesspeople flew to Israel for a bilateral summit with Israeli leaders. It was Monti's second visit to Israel in just over six months. It was the third such Italy-Israel inter-governmental summit, and the announced themes are growth, science and culture. A number of bilateral agreements were signed. The Italian delegation includes the ministers of foreign affairs, defence, economic development, justice and education, as well as scientists and information technology startup executives.

Israeli innovator creates interactive videos

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

So here's another great idea that comes out of Israel: you're watching a music video and you get to choose how the video plays out. Instead of a linear progression determined by the director, the video producers have integrated numerous variations in the narrative and left it up to the viewer to choose which they prefer.

The variations, if not endless, are numerous. One music video of his band, demonstrated by Yoni Bloch at the 2010 Techonomy conference in Israel, featured 256 variations. Viewers could choose which person sings a solo, who the camera follows and more.

Bloch is naturally excited by the interactive technology, but he's convinced its application goes way beyond music videos. TV shows, movies and educational programs all are candidates for the technology, he said.

Bloch, 31, along with his "computer geek" band mates developed the software that makes the technology operate, and he's incorporated a company, called Interlude, to bring it to market.

He was in Toronto last week as part of Raw: A Forum for Fresh Ideas, sponsored by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). The event brought together local entrepreneurs to meet Bloch and Gary Lipovetsky, president and co-founder of Dealfind. Dealfind offers subscribers daily discounted retail opportunities. Technology maven and author Marc Saltzman hosted the event.

With his blue hoodie and ready smile, Bloch looks more like a rock fan from the Annex than a successful businessman — he gets excited when he describes his favourite band, the Pixies, as well as the Canadian indie group, Mother Mother, that he follows.

But it's a fact that technology firms are beckoning him, and in Interlude's year or two in business, "we're cash-flow positive and we're in the millions in revenue. It's been a good year," he said.

Interlude's interactive technology attracted the interest of Sequoia Capital, a venture capital firm that invested $3 million in the company. Interlude's customers include heavyweights such as Nokia, Intel, Microsoft and Old Navy.

As for the rock-star element, Bloch has two Israeli gold records to his credit. It's not a big deal, he said rather modestly. In Israel you need to sell only 2,000 records to qualify. Bloch has also served as a judge on the Israeli version of American Idol, and MTV has twice given him awards for the most innovative music videos.

Bloch has always been ahead of the curve when it comes to innovation. In the late 1990s, when he was just getting started in the music business, he uploaded his songs to New Stage, an online archive of Israeli music and prose that preceded MySpace by about six years. One of his fans was the daughter of a senior record company executive. Her influence helped him get a record contract.

"I'm the first artist in the world to get a career started from the Internet," Bloch said.

Bloch considers himself part of a new generation of musicians who feel equally at home discussing art, technology and business.

He comes by his interests honestly. When he was five, his father, a physicist, bought him a Commodore 64 computer, while his mom, a painter, got him a piano. In his own way, Bloch represents the synthesis of both worlds.

That reflects something very special in Israel, Bloch said. "We don't do only one thing."

Not only does he play music, he also writes computer code and understands the business part of bringing it all to market.

Two and a half years ago he decided to create his own interactive music video. The concept took off because viewers enjoy altering the course of the story to suit them. What's more, the transitions are "seamless. They say the eyes blink, but ears do not," he said.

Saltzman recently returned from his first visit to Israel as part of a small group of technology reporters invited there by CIJA. They visited startup companies, toured the Technion and explored the country's famed historical sites.

"I don't think many Canadians realize Israel is a startup nation," he said, referring to the book, Start-Up Nation, which outlines the country's success in developing new technologies and bringing them to market.

Many blue-chip American tech companies have located in Israel, and many technologies incorporated in devices we take for granted, including computer chips and the Xbox, were developed there.

One of the technologies he witnessed allows people through eye and head movement to turn pages on a tablet ebook and otherwise control content in an open application.

Called Umooove, it has tremendous implications for people suffering physical challenges, such as ALS patients, but it no doubt will see wider applications including games, Saltzman said.

Saltzman believes there are a number of reasons behind Israel's tech creativity:

- Israel is an island surrounded by hostile neighbours and to survive Israelis have developed the drive to succeed on a global scale.
- During young people's army service, "they learn a lot and they use cutting-edge technology. They have access to high tech at a young age." The networks created in the army can later be helpful when they go into business, Saltzman said.
- Israelis have chutzpah. "That ties into them being an island in a sea of hostility... Those who drive and push forward and kick down doors are often the ones who succeed."
- It's okay to fail in Israel. The national culture doesn't see failure as a deterrent to future success. Quoting Israeli venture capitalist Jonathan Medved, he said, "Israelis eat risk" and have a drive to succeed.

That's something Bloch can relate to. "In general, Israelis are very competitive. They all grow up in a small dot on the map, surrounded by enemies. We have dreams of doing big things," he said.

As for Interlude, "we want to be the standard of interactive video, but we want interactive video to be the standard" (in video), he said.

Canadian novelist Edeet Ravel a late bloomer

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Edeet Ravel's first novel was published when she was in her early 40s. But years before, as a girl growing up on a newly established kibbutz in northern Israel, she knew she would be a writer one day.

"I felt instinctively, when I was six or seven, that I would spend my life trying to write stories," said Ravel, a finalist for the Governor General's Literary Award and the Giller Prize and the recipient of the Hugh MacLennan Prize and the Canadian Jewish Book Award.

"I knew that the main requirement was an acquaintance with what lies beneath the surface of things. That need to delve into our hidden lives was tied to my understanding of what a writer needs to be able to write."

In retrospect, she mused without the slightest pretension, she is amazed she grasped this fundamental principle at such a young age, before she had even read a single book of adult fiction or had been encouraged to follow her writerly dreams.

Ravel, whose books range from Ten Thousand Lovers and Look for Me to A Wall of Light and The Last Rain, was clearly something of a late bloomer.

But she has no regrets.

"My own reasons for waiting to publish had to do with my perfectionist streak," said Ravel, who took her first creative writing course at Montreal's Concordia University when she was 27. "I'm very glad I waited, though I'm never entirely satisfied with what I write. There's always a gap between what I envision and what I create."

Now a resident of Guelph, Ont., she dips into her well of experiences when she is ready to compose a novel, the latest of which, The Cat (Penguin Canada), was published on Sept. 25.

"Many of the characters in The Cat – a novel turning on grief and hope amid a devastating tragedy – were inspired by people I know. I asked some of them to read the manuscript, since there were close parallels between their lives and those of my fictional characters."

Some novelists possess the ability to distill the essence of a foreign place and a culture almost instantly. But she does not place herself in that category.

"I have to confine myself to what is familiar to me," she said. "Margaret Lawrence believed that the emotional world is the same everywhere, and that's the world she was interested in. That is what I try to write about as well. Everything for me begins and ends with the way we think and feel."

Apart from The Cat, at least two of her previous novels, The Last Rain and Your Sad Eyes and Unforgettable Mouth, are broadly biographical. Ravel was born in 1955 in Sasa, a kibbutz near the Lebanese border founded by new immigrants from Canada and the United States. Her parents, Nahum and Aviva, who hailed from Montreal, were among the founders. "That story," she noted, "is part of The Last Rain, a fictionalized memoir about my first seven years in Sasa, a Shomer Hatzair kibbutz."

Nahum and Aviva Ravel were utopian idealists whose blueprint for a just society was inspired by Marxism. "They wanted to create a better world."

At first, Aviva was not too interested in Zionism, much less Marxism. But as Ravel recalled, "she fell in love with Israel and with Hebrew once she was in the country."

Aviva was 14 when she went out with Nahum on their first date. Their courtship unfolded through countless letters after he joined the Canadian army during World War II. "As soon as the war ended, my father took an unauthorized leave to marry my mother, who was 17."

In Sasa, Aviva was a teacher, while Nahum held various jobs. "In The Last Rain, I write about some of the factors that influenced their decision to leave the kibbutz. My mother, like many married women on kibbutzim, was ready to leave long before my father."

"I kept my memories of Sasa alive in a very deliberate way. They were extremely precious to me, and I knew I would write about them. Those first seven years shaped me, mostly for the better. There were some drawbacks, which had to do with the sleeping arrangements, but many profound benefits. I'm very grateful that I have that background."

To her regret, she has not maintained contact with Sasa. "My parents renewed their ties with Sasa through an ex-members group, but there was no easy way for me to stay in touch. I don't know what Sasa is like today, though it's one of the wealthiest kibbutzim in Israel."

After leaving Sasa in 1962, the Ravels returned to Montreal, living in Cote des Neiges and then Notre Dame de Grace. This period, she observed, forms the background of Your Sad Eyes and Unforgettable Mouth.

At the age of 18, she went back to Israel.

"As far as I was concerned, I was in Canada temporarily. I continued to see myself as an Israeli. I had no idea what I was doing in Canada. Even after losing my Hebrew accent and fluency in Hebrew, I daydreamed about Israel continually and longed to be there. I was in the west, but my heart was in the east, and still is."

From the moment she landed in Israel, on the eve of the 1973 Yom Kippur War, she was convinced it would always be her home. "I was to stay."

It was a busy time for Ravel. She completed a BA and an MA in English literature at the Hebrew University, and met her first husband, an Israeli pianist, in Israel.

None too eager to live in Israel, he convinced Ravel to leave. They settled in Montreal. "He promised it would be only for a year, but life unfolded in its own way." Their marriage finally broke up due to his refusal to have children.

Being financially strapped, Ravel was unable to return to Israel. "Feminists used to say, 'Biology is destiny.' More often, bank accounts are destiny."

After an unsuccessful attempt to live in Britain, she returned to Montreal, where she took a creative writing course under the direction of Terry Byrnes, the first person to take her seriously as a writer. She also finished a Ph.D in Jewish studies at McGill University, specializing in biblical exegesis.

For the next two decades, she taught creative writing and Jewish studies at McGill, Concordia University and John Abbot College. She enjoyed her teaching positions, but left academia to devote herself to writing. "It was a risky move, but I'm glad I made that decision."

In the meantime, she met a man, a translator who became the father of her only child, Larissa. They divorced when Larissa was a toddler, but shared custody of her and remained on cordial terms. "Until Larissa, finished high school, he lived a few minutes' walk from us, and Larissa strolled over whenever she felt like it."

She and Larissa moved to Guelph because big-city living was no longer appealing. "It exhausted me," she said. "Guelph was a town I wanted to live in, and Guelph had a university Larissa wanted to study at. We relocated as a family of two."

Ravel would be pleased if she could find a position as an instructor in creative writing, but there are currently few openings. "As a result, I'm constantly struggling," she said, adding she would not be able to survive without her former partner's assistance.

Although Israel is very far from Guelph, Ravel is peripherally involved in Israel's peace movement. "I always say hope is a political obligation. We have no choice, though it's not easy to maintain hope."

Clearly not a supporter of the current Israeli government, Ravel said, "We are waiting for a visionary leader who demonstrates integrity and courage. Idealistic people are often not the ones who are drawn to politics. This, of course, is a problem everywhere."

Family circumstance and curiosity brought boutique perfumer Ayala Moriel from the city of Tel Aviv to the other end of the world, to the west coast of Canada.

Now 36, and considering a move back to Israel, Moriel mainly relies on electronic communication to help her develop custom-made scents from exotic ingredients that evoke the Arab market in the Old City of Jerusalem or the verdant valleys that lead to the Mediterranean Sea from Israel's Galilee. A consultation with her artisanal perfume house can start with an online questionnaire, and even a phone interview or personal meeting in Vancouver.

Moriel has also created about 50 signature scents with names such as Zohar, Sahlab and Finjan, and is working with companies to help create a commercial line of fragrances to be repackaged under other brand names for products such as natural cleaning supplies.

Moriel's perfumes do not contain synthetic musk or odour-enhancing chemicals.

Though aware of the allergenic or toxic effects of synthetic perfumes, Moriel stays out of the politics of this debate in the perfume industry by saying that she works with only natural substances for esthetic reasons. Natural perfumes have hues and layers much more resonant and complex than synthetic big-name brands at airport duty-free shops and American department stores, she said.

Living between the juxtaposed cultures of Jewish hippies, Druze villagers and Arab farmers helped define Moriel as the exotic, all-natural perfumer she is today.

Born in 1976 in Montreal, she immigrated to Israel at the age of three with her mother and stepfather. They helped found the alternative ecological village, Kil, in Israel's north.

"It was like heaven for a little girl because we had so much freedom and loved the nature and flowers around us," she told Israel21c. For a few years, her family lived without electricity.

When she was in her early 20s, Moriel and her husband and baby went to look for new opportunities - and Moriel's birth father - in Canada. It would prove to be a difficult period in her life.

After a separation that left her alone with her autistic daughter in Vancouver, Moriel turned to burning incense to help her relieve stress and anxiety.

Enjoying it so much, Moriel decided to try making her own incense, but it did not live up to her expectations, smelling like a burning marijuana joint instead. Why not create scents that don't need to be burned, she reasoned? Her unique brand, Ayala Moriel Parfums, was hatched.

That was about 10 years ago.

Always looking to her Middle Eastern home for inspiration, she returned to her Jewish roots this year by launching a new perfume called Etrog, which distills the hauntingly sweet smell of the citron, an aromatic citrus fruit used as a symbol in the fall holiday of Sukkot.

Before committing to a large order of Etrog, or any other scent for that matter, for about $50 Moriel will send a broad sample of scents in the mail - each bottle containing at least a week's worth of perfume. Customers can then work with Moriel to choose the right scent.

With winter coming, her perfumes offer an exotic pick-me-up, she said. The lack of scents in chilly Canada pushes Moriel to keep surrounding herself with the rich aromas she remembers from childhood. She said the warm, humid climate in Israel contains more fragrances than colder countries, and besides coming to see her growing family in Israel every year, she is drawn to the scents.

"I am sensitive to the smells in Vancouver now and can pick up the cherry and linden blossoms. But it's really the Middle Eastern heat that brings out the best in plants and flowers," she said.

"And in the spring... there are orange blossoms in full bloom. I try to time my trips back to Israel around this time."

Geoff Kolomayz, in the role of Asher Lev, paints Rachel, played by Tracey Beltrano, as Mark Albert, who plays Lev's father and the rebbe, looks over.

Art and religion conflict in Teatron season opener

Kathryn Kates
Special to The C/JN

My Name Is Asher Lev, a play about a young Jewish man torn between his chassidic roots and his desperate need to fulfil his artistic promise, marks the opening of Teatron's 10th season of Jewish-themed plays.

Adapted by Aaron Posner from the Chaim Potok novel of the same name, the show is directed by Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre founder Ari Weisberg. It runs at the Toronto Centre for the Arts Studio Theatre from Nov. 7 to 18.

The play stars Toronto actor Geoff Kolomayz in the title role. Kolomayz, who previously appeared in Teatron's A Tiny Piece of Land, shares the stage with actors Mark Albert and Tracey Beltrano.

Kolomayz says one of the reasons he was drawn to the play was that although it is about the artist figuring out what he needs to do about himself in respects to family and tradition and the community where he fits, it's a struggle that is truly universal.

"It is not unique to the artist. Whether you are going to grow up and be a lawyer or grow up and be a factory worker... you need to figure out where you are going for yourself and that challenge sits in respect to your exterior influences," Kolomayz says.

"Your parents may want you to be a lawyer, but if you want to be a doctor, you may have to struggle to face those challenges of not being a lawyer in their eyes. In this story, it is depicted through the very high stakes of a genius of an artist who is in a community that doesn't support his art to the level where it is actually against his religion.

"The greatest thing audiences should get out of this is story, first and foremost, is that 'they should enjoy themselves,'" says Kolomayz. "The bigger picture that I would like an audience to receive is the ability to discuss, to reflect back and hopefully make strong choices for themselves and feel satisfied about their choices."

Kolomayz says he can relate to Asher since as an actor he faced struggles that every artist faces in general. But, Kolomayz adds, he was fortunate in that although his family sometimes questioned his career choice, they were supportive of him.

Kolomayz says playing Asher is challenging since much of the play is a monologue. "This role is so demanding of me. I've done one-man shows before where you are on stage for about 45 minutes. This is a different beast. It is a two-hour show that I don't leave the stage for, and much of it is presented in a monologue format, so it is a challenge to keep all this in my head and follow the story through, and in the end, as an actor, hopefully be able to present this to an audience who will understand the story that we're putting up on the stage."

Kolomayz, a graduate of University of Waterloo's drama and theatre program, is recognized for his character work, including in the role of Templeton Rat in Charlotte's Web, all five roles in The Adventures of Mazel and Schlimazel, the barkeep in Six Reasons Why and Jesse in Sundance. He's also the co-artistic director for Mirador Theatre and the co-director of films for the Mississauga Independent Film Festival.

Dear Mr. Waldman recreates Holocaust trauma

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Hanan Peled's nostalgia-drenched movie, Dear Mr. Waldman, recreates a simpler, more innocent time in Israel when the wounds of the Holocaust were still fresh and raw.

The 86-minute 2006 film, set in Tel Aviv in 1962, is scheduled to be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Society on Nov. 4 at 4 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. at the JCC's Al Green Theatre.

The plot is straightforward. Moshe Waldman (Rami Heuberger), a printer, is haunted by memories of the Holocaust. His wife, Rivka (Jenya Dodina), is a survivor, too, but she lives in the present and wants to move on.

Moshe's trauma is piqued by a story in a local newspaper about a U.S. government official, Jack Waldman, who has been appointed as an adviser to the president, John F. Kennedy. Claiming that Waldman is his long-lost son, Moshe writes him a letter.

At this juncture, the film takes a detour, leaving the Waldman matter aside momentarily.

Froye (Doval'e Glickman), Moshe's flamboyant partner, drives up in a shiny new Studebaker sedan, urging him to buy an apartment in Holon, an up-and-coming suburb of Tel Aviv.

Jenya Dodina and Rami Heuberger in Dear Mr. Waldman.

Moshe and Rivka would certainly appreciate a bigger flat. Theirs is so cramped that their two boys can hear them making love at night.

Peled's references to a new car and the promise of better living conditions underscore the austerity that framed the lives of most Israelis in the early 1960s. So when Moshe brings home a new washing machine one fine day, the device is treated like a gift from the gods.

Amid these events, Hilik (Ido Port), their precocious 10-year-old son, learns about the birds and the bees from a girl his age.

In what seems like a miraculous development, Moshe receives a letter from Waldman in which he writes that he jumped off a train bound for a Nazi concentration camp in Poland and thereby saved himself from certain death.

Moshe is elated. His son is alive! Or is he?

Peled weaves together these disparate strands into a beautiful cinematic tapestry, making Dear Mr. Waldman a film well worth watching.

An accompanying animated short by Anne Marie Fleming, I Was A Child Of Holocaust Survivors, is based on Bernice Eisenstein's graphic novel.

This poignant 15-minute movie, a National Film Board of Canada production, unfolds in Toronto and is about the mingling of memory and pain in a Jewish immigrant family touched by the scars of a great tragedy.

Two-part series charts Hitler's rise to power

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

How could a failed artist and racist rabble-rouser like Adolf Hitler attain the highest office in the land in a country as modern and civilized as Germany?

The answer unfolds in Apocalypse Hitler, a riveting two-part DVD released by Entertainment One Films Canada Inc. on the eve of Holocaust Education Week, which starts today, and presented by Isabelle Clarke and Daniel Costelle.

Born into a working-class family of perhaps partial Jewish origin in a provincial town in Austria, Hitler was certainly not destined for immortality. Circumstances, however, decreed otherwise.

Fanatical, clever and opportunistic, Hitler turned into an arch German nationalist after serving as a lowly soldier on the western front in World War I, an event he would describe as the most sublime of his life.

A struggling artist who had been rejected by the art school of his choice, he emerged from the trenches utterly convinced that Germany had been stabbed in the back by Jewish traitors. A gifted orator, he harped on this outlandish theme after joining the National Socialist German Workers Party, the precursor of the Nazi party.

The film, which is entirely in colour, traces his role in the 1923 putsch in Munich, his imprisonment on charges of treason and his authorship of Mein Kampf, the turgid bible of the Nazi movement that would sell 80 million copies from 1933 onward.

We learn, in an aside, that the first black SS uniforms were designed by Hugo Boss, whose expensive menswear is all the rage these days.

The film underscores the maxim that perseverance is a quality that politicians should possess.

The Nazis hit bottom in the 1928 election, winning only 2.6 per cent of the votes. But Hitler carried on. He exploited the impact the Depression had on many Germans, and he appealed to their sense of outrage by harping on the 1919 Treaty of Versailles, which humiliated Germany.

According to British historian Ian Kershaw, Hitler would have remained on the ragged periphery of German politics, and would have been considered a nut case, had it not been for the economic crisis of the early 1930s.

A skilful manipulator, he offered Germans hope of a better tomorrow and fanned fears of a Communist takeover. And in a master stroke, he convinced a considerable number of Germans that the old political order was discredited.

When the Nazi party lost 40 of its parliamentary seats in the November 1932 election, some gleeful observers prematurely concluded that Hitler was a spent force. They were labouring under a huge misconception, of course. Within two months of this setback, Germany's ailing president, Paul von Hindenburg, appointed Hitler as chancellor.

Apocalypse Hitler makes it abundantly clear that the new chancellor played his cards extremely well.

Rather than being a compliant tool at the disposal of conservatives like von Hindenburg, Hitler, a tireless conspirator, had a plan. He consolidated his power, arrested and murdered opponents on the left and right and engineered the infamous Reichstag fire.

In line with antisemitic Nazi ideology, the propaganda minister to-be, Joseph Goebbels, openly threatened German Jews, just a month after Hitler became chancellor, and the new regime staged the first state-organized boycott of Jewish shops in April 1933. Having ordered reams of books to be burned throughout Germany, Goebbels said, "The era of Jewish intellectualism is over."

Apocalypse Hitler reaches a sombre conclusion. Most Germans embraced Hitler's totalitarian regime and displayed indifference to the persecution of Jews.

Syria uses a 'security solution' to crush uprising: author

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

SYRIA is drowning in a vicious civil war as its headstrong president, Bashar Assad, wilfully destroys the country in piecemeal fashion in a desperate bid to ensure his survival and that of his brutal, dictatorial Baathist regime.

The popular uprising in Syria – Israel's most truculent neighbour – broke out in March 2011 and has since turned increasingly violent.

With cities like Aleppo and Homs having been reduced to war zones and with the death toll having passed the 25,000 mark, the Syrian revolt has morphed into the most violent insurrection of the Arab Spring, the rebellions that have convulsed the Arab world for the past two years.

In purely financial terms, the uprising has been catastrophic as well. Economic losses have cost Syria at least $34 billion, according to Syrian Prime Minister Wael al-Halqi, but opposition figures claim that the real figure may be as high as $100 billion and counting.

The revolt began as a peaceful protest, but due to the regime's heavy-handed response, it degenerated into a life-and-death struggle.

Assad opted for a "security solution," writes Carsten Wieland in his informative and authoritative book, Syria – A Decade of Lost Chances, published by Cune Press in Seattle. To Assad, the uprising was and still is a zero-sum game, with the winner taking all the spoils.

Wieland, a German diplomat, knows Syria as well as any foreigner can, having lived in Damascus for two years and visited the country often. His readable book, based largely on first-hand sources and combining journalistic flair with academic gravitas, is meant for a general readership.

The revolt erupted in the periphery, in the flyblown southern town of Dara'a, and gradually spread to major urban centres such as Homs, Hama, Aleppo and Damascus, he notes.

In Dara'a, government agents arrested 15 schoolchildren who had courageously scrawled anti-regime graffiti on walls. They were thrown into prison and tortured. Protests broke out as parents demanded their immediate release.

In reaction to further demonstrations, police used live ammunition, worsening the situation. Instead of using kid gloves to defuse the tension, Wieland says, the regime, accustomed to docility from its citizens, deployed brute force.

Citing another defining moment in the rebellion, Wieland refers to an event that occurred a month earlier in the Old City of Damascus, when the son of a textile shop owner was beaten up by police. "Nothing unusual in a police state," he observes. "However, this time something extraordinary happened. People gathered to support the victim."

Doubtlessly emboldened by revolts in neighbouring Arab countries, Syrians had lost their fear and patience and were no longer prepared to accept the status quo of stagnation, paralysis and repression. "After the Facebook-co-ordinated protests in Tunisia and Egypt, Syria experienced the first YouTube revolution in history," he writes in a succinct summation of the role that social media played in Syria's national rebellion.

This, of course, was a highly ironic development, since Assad, in the name of technological progress, had introduced satellite dishes and built a modern communication infrastructure in Syria.

Realizing that the rebellion was spinning out of control, Assad offered a series of cosmetic concessions. State salaries, pensions, subsidies and social benefits were increased and mild political reforms were ushered in.

"In the context of the times, the moves turned out to be inadequate," Wieland writes, suggesting they might have had a meaningful impact had they been phased in years earlier, when the very idea of challenging the regime would have been unthinkable.

If he had played his cards right, he says, Assad could have avoided the catastrophe currently engulfing Syria.

Having succeeded his father in 2000, following his sudden death, Assad launched his presidential career as a reformer, promising to open up Syrian society. Arts and letters enjoyed greater freedom of expression, debating clubs sprang up and cellphones and computers became accessible to a wider range of Syrians, Wieland says.

But the Damascus Spring did not last long. Far more focused on stability than on democratic experiments, Assad cracked down, nipping in the bud Syria's tentative transition toward pluralism and a civil society.

"Arbitrary arrests, confiscations, torture, solitary confinement, ill treatment and dismal conditions in crowded prisons made up the dark side of everyday life in a Syria that otherwise appeared peaceful on the surface," Wieland writes in a stinging indictment of the regime.

From the day he succeeded his father, Hafez, who was a self-styled liberalizer as well, Assad boasted of his strong personal relationship with the "beloved people of Syria." Yet Assad, having called on Syrians in his inaugural speech "to participate in the process of development and modernization," was never really ready for genuine democracy.

Certainly, Assad was shocked by the rebellion, having sanctimoniously told the Wall Street Journal in a January 2011 interview that Syria would not be affected by the Arab Spring.

As he put it, "We have more difficult circumstances than most of the Arab countries, but in spite of that Syria is stable. Why? Because you have to be very closely linked to the beliefs of the people. This is the core issue. When there is divergence between your policy and the people's beliefs and interests, you will have this vacuum that creates disturbances."

Precisely.

Wieland correctly points out that Syria's status as the "beating heart" of Arab nationalism, its antagonism to Israel and its pro-Palestinian rhetoric did not detract Syrians from demanding change.

"Rhetorical broadsides against Israel remained a welcomed means of creating consensus," he writes. "It was easy to gain the population's support for these matters, thus distracting them from economic and political problems at home."

But after the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003, Wieland adds, Assad's position on the Palestinian issue "oscillated between readiness to compromise and an ideological hard line."

In 2008, Syria and Israel launched indirect negotiations through the good offices of Turkey, which had solid relations with both sides. These talks collapsed when Israel invaded the Gaza Strip in 2009.

According to Frederick Hof, a U.S. diplomat well acquainted with the Syrian file, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his defence minister, Ehud Barak, opened secret talks with Assad in 2010 after Israel reportedly agreed in principle to withdraw from the Golan Heights. These discussions ended early in 2011 with the outbreak of the Syrian insurrection.

Nonetheless, Wieland says, every faction in the splintered Syrian opposition concurs on the need to recover the Golan.

Syria – A Decade of Lost Chances should be read in conjunction with Stephen Starr's Revolt in Syria: Eye-Witness to the Uprising (Columbia University Press). Starr, an Irish journalist who has been reporting from Syria for the past five years and has many contacts there, explains why Syria – an ethnically and religiously diverse nation – was so prone to instability. His analysis of the country's minorities is especially instructive.

Hiking trail crosses Israel without interruption

Yehezkel Laing
Israel21c.org

Just how small is the State of Israel? It is small enough for thousands of people every year to cross the entire length of the country by foot power alone.

They do it via a special hiking path called the Israel National Trail (INT) or Israel Trail for short ("Shvil Yisrael" in Hebrew) that winds its way over almost 1,000 kilometres of terrain.

Starting in Metulla, on the northern border next to Lebanon, the trail finishes in Eilat, at Israel's southern tip on the Red Sea. While many countries have hiking trails crossing large portions of their land, Israel is believed to be the only country in the world to offer a trail crossing its entire length without interruption.

It's been said that the Holy Land comprises a wider variety of landscapes in less space than anywhere in the world, and nothing proves that better than the Israel Trail. The INT includes all the wonders that Israel has to offer. Crammed into its length are snow-capped mountains, desert craters, forested hills, Lake Kinneret, the Mediterranean Sea coastline with its sandy beaches and more.

"The biggest draw is the scenery," says Gal Hart, an Israel Trail administrator.

"In other countries, the landscape may change every few weeks of hiking. In Israel, the landscape changes radically every day or two, providing a feast for the senses."

The trail also provides a cornucopia for history buffs, allowing hikers to walk in the footsteps of the Israelite tribes, ancient kings and religious leaders, with ample archeological discoveries to see along the way.

For many, the Israel Trail is more than just a nature hike. It's a way to escape the rat race, slow time down and connect with Israel – its land and people – on a primal level in a single embrace. Walking at a regular pace, the average hiker can finish the entire route in one to two months. Strong hikers have been known to finish in only three weeks.

The trail has also been subdivided to allow for shorter journeys. Hundreds of hiking groups walk these smaller portions of the trail every month, until they complete the entire length over two years.

The Society for the Protection of Nature (SPNI) in Israel recommends hiking when temperatures are most moderate, in the fall and spring. While essentially a nature route, the path frequently passes by towns, which enables hikers to easily resupply their provisions.

Though it long ago achieved legendary status, the trail is actually less than 20 years old. Like many great projects, it began with a vision. While hiking the American Appalachian Trail in 1980, Israeli journalist Avraham Tamir had an inspiration: why not build a similar trail crossing the entire land of Israel?

Hikers travel the Israel Trail.

When he got back home, he went straight to SPNI director Ori Devir, who fell in love with the concept. Though the trail was mostly made by joining together existing hiking routes, it still took more than 15 years to complete. In 1995, it was finally inaugurated.

"Many embark on the trail to mark the end of a special event or the beginning of a new one," says Hart.

It's common, for instance, for Israeli soldiers who have finished their mandatory three-year service to celebrate their discharge by hiking the trail. Newlyweds walk it for their honeymoons, married couples on their anniversaries and younger hikers to mark their bar or bat mitzvah.

Other regions in Israel, especially the south, are ideal for solitude. For Hart, the most beautiful section is in the Negev between Mitzpe Ramon and the Arava Desert. "There you can walk for over four days through some of the most spectacular scenery and not meet a single soul."

A few years ago, SPNI initiated the Trail Angels Program. This group of Good Samaritans (most of them veterans of the INT themselves and living in proximity to its path) open their homes to the hikers, providing them with much-appreciated amenities and refreshments.

Record numbers of tourists visit Israel in 2012

Steve Walz

Special to The CIN

Despite dire warnings of imminent conflict between Israel and Iran, foreign tourists ignored the spectre of nuclear Armageddon and flocked to the Holy Land in record numbers in 2012.

According to Israel's Ministry of Tourism, the Jewish calendar year 5772 was the "best tourism year ever," with more than 3.5 million visitors spending at least one day in the Holy Land.

Within the context of the secular calendar year, from January 2012 until the end of September, a new record of 2.6 million visitor arrivals was registered, seven per cent more than the same period last year and six per cent more than the previous record in 2010. Of these arrivals, 2.2 million were tourists, four per cent more than the same period last year, and 444,000 were one-day visitors, 27 per cent more than last year. The Ministry of Tourism anticipates that the total number of visitors to Israel by the end of December will mimic the Jewish calendar year's record-setting statistics.

The impressive numbers caught the ministry and hotel industry executives by surprise. "At the end of the day, the statistics are surprising, because the original tourism industry forecast for 2012 was that incoming tourism would decline due to the repercussions of the Arab Spring in the region, as well as the Iranian threat," said Uri Steinberg, a spokesperson for the Ministry of Tourism's marketing department.

"What we discovered was that the lure of foreign tourism to Israel was much more resilient than we thought. Can you imagine what the numbers would have been had there been no ripple effects in the region from the Arab Spring?"

A Ministry of Tourism survey of incoming tourists conducted last year found that there was a substantial increase in the numbers North American Jewish tourists who visited Israel, Steinberg added. "The increasing trend of North American Jews visiting Israel is influenced by friends and neighbours and not by the mass media, which has not painted a positive picture of the situation in and around Israel."

In the coming months, in order to take advantage of the word-of-mouth positive experiences, the ministry will launch a marketing campaign based on the concept of 'friends inviting friends' to visit Israel. "We are taking nothing for granted," Steinberg said.

Israeli hotel executives and Steinberg are cautiously optimistic that the success of 2012 will carry into 2013. Based on a random survey of some of the top hotels in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, bookings for the forthcoming fall and winter tourism seasons remain strong.

Tel Aviv, which has a pulsating round-the-clock Mediterranean lifestyle, has resonated with Hollywood celebrities, such as Emmy Award-winning actor Claire "Homeland" Danes, who recently posed for a fashion photo shoot in Tel Aviv for the New York Times fashion magazine. She told late-night TV talk-show host Conan O'Brien that Tel Aviv was one of the most "intense" party towns she had ever visited. The Port of Tel Aviv is renowned for its trendy bars and dance clubs.

"As Tel Aviv is also considered the commercial centre of Israel, there is still a very strong market for business travellers from North America and the U.K., even during the winter months, with many conventions, corporate meetings, etc.," said Jean-Louis Ripoche, general manager of the five-star Sheraton Tel Aviv Hotel. "There are also many tourists who come from the U.K. to Tel Aviv for long weekends during the winter in order to escape from the cold weather back home, so they can enjoy the sea and sun in Tel Aviv. For them, 70 degrees in January is considered warm."

In Jerusalem, Alex Herman, the vice-president of sales and marketing at the Inbal Jerusalem Hotel, which was recently tabbed by the globe-trotting readers of Condé Nast Traveler magazine, as being one of the top five hotels in the Middle East, said that the City of Gold's crisp, fresh air and lack of crowds makes it a great locale for a winter getaway. "During the fall and winter months, the hotel features conventions, organizational gatherings [such as the recent Hadassah Centennial mission], not to mention the Jewish and Christian holiday seasons, as well as winter vacationers who come from the U.S.A. and Canada to visit their kids in the local yeshivas and seminaries," said Herman. "The hotel features winter-themed attractions, which could include special treatments in our spa, new culinary offerings in our restaurant or local tours of the city that revolve around a holiday theme."

Several Israeli hotel chains also offer a variety of deals in the Dead Sea region, where large numbers of European, Russian and North American tourists seek to escape from the chilly weather back home in order to bathe in the warm, healing waters of the Dead Sea.

Gymnast honoured as all-American golden girl

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — In the months since 18-year-old American artistic gymnast Alexandra "Aly" Raisman won two gold medals and one bronze at the London Olympics, she has been adored as an all-American girl.

She's graced the cover of Sports Illustrated, appeared on the major TV talk shows, and earned millions for her endorsements with Ralph Lauren, Pandora Jewelry, Poland Spring and others.

Raisman has also won a special place in the hearts of Israelis and Jews worldwide, as much for what she said as what she accomplished at the Olympics.

Following the medal ceremony after winning gold for her floor exercise — to the accompaniment of the Jewish folk song Hava Negilah Raisman said:

"The floor music wasn't intentional, but having it played on the 40th anniversary is special, and winning the gold means a lot to me. If there had been a moment's silence, I would have supported it and respected it." Raisman's words were in reference to the International Olympic Committee's (IOC) refusal to honour the 11 Israeli Olympians murdered at the 1972 Games with a moment of silence at the opening ceremony of the London Olympics.

Raisman is currently on a 34-city American tour with her U.S. teammates, but she flew to Miami recently on an off night to be honoured by the Women's International Zionist Organization (WIZO) at a fundraising dinner attended by more than 400 supporters.

"Tonight is an honour I will never forget. I feel so proud and bonded with everyone here to support Israel and the wonderful work of WIZO. I am American, an Olympian and also a Jew who feels so elated for having my dreams come true," Raisman told the crowd.

"It is exciting to have everything I wanted as a young girl come true. To also have the opportunity of showing how proud I am of being Jewish and standing up for what I believe is right is an honour I will never forget," she added.

"Aly is very proud and upfront about being Jewish. Nobody will ever forget her message for generations to come. Aly showed how very integrated her Jewish heritage is in everything she does," said Rabbi Keith Stern of Temple Beth Avodah of Newton, Mass., who has known Raisman since she was three years old.

"Aly inspired so many with her bravery in standing up to the IOC. I had a letter from the son of a 94-year-old Holocaust survivor in Warsaw. She watched Aly on television at the Olympics and was astonished and moved both by Aly's performance to Hava Nagilah and her words in honour of the slain Israeli athletes," added Rabbi Stern.

According to Rabbi Stern, his congregation has received thousands of requests for Raisman to speak at synagogues, Jewish day schools and Jewish fundraising organizations in Canada, the United States and Israel.

The honours keep mounting for Raisman: Israel's minister of Diaspora affairs has invited Raisman and her family to tour the country as his personal guests; next April, she will be inducted into the National Jewish Sports Hall Of Fame in New York, and she'll be a shoo-in to be inducted into the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in Israel when she retires.

"I have absolutely no plans to retire yet. I have to train, compete and prepare for the 2016 Olympics and build for my team to win gold again. I have to stay focused, and will go to college after I retire," she said.

Born and raised in Needham, Mass., Raisman first took up gymnastics at age two in a Mommy and Me class. By the time she was eight, she was identified as an elite athlete and worked under coach Mihai Brestyan, who has remained with her ever since.

As captain, Raisman led the American team to a gold medal at the 2011 World Artistic Championships in Tokyo.

Her maturity and experience as captain of the five-member U.S. Olympic team, nicknamed the "Fab Five" and "Fierce Five," led Raisman to win three medals, more than any other teammate.

She was especially impressive in the floor exercise program, becoming the first American ever in her sport to win gold in that category.

Raisman in costume during the current Kellogg's Tour Of Champions

She began her feat with a high spring and snap, following up with impressive dance steps and concluded with a thunderous run and a perfectly timed split jump — all with Hava Nagilah playing in the background, lifting her spirits and building the crowd to a frenzy.

Raisman outdistanced her opponents with a near-perfect 15.6 score — her best tally ever in the most important moment in her life.

"My gold medal performance is the best performance I have ever done. That's what I worked for all my life. I just want to rejoice," said Raisman, upon learning that she won the gold medal.

Translated into English, Hava Negilah means, "let us rejoice," and Jews worldwide will certainly rejoice in Raisman's Olympic glory for generations to come.

NBA head Stern to retire in 2014

JTA
NEW YORK — David Stern, the commissioner of the National Basketball Association (NBA), said he will retire on Feb. 1, 2014, after 30 years in the position.

Stern, 70, began working for the NBA in 1966 as outside counsel.

The league's board of governors approved deputy commissioner Adam Silver as Stern's successor. Both Stern and Silver are Jewish.

Silver, who began working for the NBA in 1993 and has served as deputy commissioner since 2006, served with Stern as lead negotiator during the 2011 NBA lockout.

Show fuses flamenco dance, poetry, music

Kathryn Kates
Special to the CJN

One of Europe's leading flamenco performers, Yana Maizel, is returning to Toronto for the North American première of My Name Is Not Carmen!

The Russian-born, Toronto-raised Maizel stars in the show, which she created and choreographed, a performance that fuses theatre, dance, poetry, music, philosophical discourse and personal revelation. She's joined on stage by Thiago Vasquez on guitar and cante (vocals) and Cristo Cortes, who performs palmas (hand-clapping) and cante.

Maizel, who is currently based in Paris, has been busy creating for others. A few years ago, however, she finally produced something for herself when she was asked to create a short piece for a dance festival. She expanded that piece and retitled it My Name Is Not Carmen!

The show's original title, Life is a train station. I'll soon be going, but where I cannot say, was taken from a letter by 20th-century Russian poet Marina Tsvetaeva. "Life has always been a train station for me as I have immigrated from one place to another, always having my suitcases with me. Suitcases for me, meaning clothes, meaning experience, meaning memories, meaning everything... that's from ever since I've been a child. Since my first trip from Russia, I have been in train stations and airports," she says.

My Name Is Not Carmen! is a catchier title for her show and also the name of one of the scenes. Unlike many other flamenco dancers who come from outside Spain, Maizel did not change her name to "Carmen" or another Spanish-sounding moniker but purposely kept her Ashkenazi name.

Maizel's own journey has taken her from St. Petersburg to Toronto, and to and from Spain and Paris. While in Spain, she discovered her gift for flamenco.

For the text of My Name Is Not Carmen!, Maizel's words are interwoven with the poetry and prose of others. She mixes languages, including Russian, English, Spanish and French, into a musical canvas of various melodies and rhythms, with virtuoso Spanish guitar juxtaposed against Rachmaninoff vocal works and the clicking of heels of traditional flamenco dance.

"This is a solo piece that I have wanted to create for myself, having wanted to do it for years and years, but never had the time or strength," Maizel says. "I had something to say about identity and what people expect me to be, what I want to be and am striving all the time to be and I'm actually not. What I am is what I actually am... it is the simplest thing."

Maizel says she loves pure flamenco, but for the purpose of this show she takes flamenco out of its context while staying true to the traditional flamenco dance itself. Her costumes include a typical frilly flamenco dress that wasn't part of her original show.

"It is a pretty emotional show," she says. "People in Paris came away seeing themselves in the show. I tell my story, but a lot of people recognize themselves in the issues of identity that we all have. I want people to take the time to accept the different world I'm bringing to them because flamenco isn't something that's everyday. My show is in different languages. I want people to be taken by the sounds and music of the languages without panicking that they don't understand the language."

"It's a journey from one place to another and another, and I hope to take people with me on this journey."

My Name Is Not Carmen! is presented by Show One Productions in association with the sixth annual Toronto International Flamenco Festival on Nov. 8 and 9 at 8 p.m. at the Jane Mallett Theatre in the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts. Ticket info online at: www.stlc.com or by calling 416-366-7723. For more information, visit www.showoneproductions.ca.

TV HOST TEACHES HOW TO BET ON A HORSE

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Natalie Zak is not a betting woman, but she plays one on TV.

The Thornhill, Ont., native, who introduces herself on air as Nat Zak, is the host of Bet Night Live. On the show, broadcast by the Score Television Network, she teaches people at a horse racetrack how to bet.

"It's an interactive betting show based on four live races where we encourage people to play along on an online contest," she said. "The top five people qualify to a final show where we give a grand prize of $10,000 and a luxury trip to Vegas."

Bet Night Live host Natalie Zak teaches people how to place bets at a horse race.

On the twice-weekly program, she approaches a random person at Woodbine Racetrack and gives her or him money and advice on how to place bets.

Though she's a betting expert these days, Zak didn't know much about horse racing before joining Woodbine Entertainment and Gaming in 2006. Instead, she said she has developed her knowledge along the way.

"It's just honing my skills, learning as I go," she said. "If you can tell a story on horse racing, you can tell a story on anything."

After graduating from Ryerson University's radio and television arts program, Zak found a job as a server at Wegz Stadium Bar in Vaughan, Ont., owned by Woodbine Entertainment, which also operates Woodbine Racetrack.

From there, she worked her way up the ranks at the company to her current position as host and segment producer of Bet Night Live.

"I never thought I'd end up in sports. I always thought I'd end up in entertainment," she said.

However, entertainment does play a huge part in her role on the show. She has interviewed many hockey players and celebrities, including Charlie Sheen and Anil Kapoor, all of whom discussed topics not necessarily related to horse racing.

The interview with Kapoor, known for his role as the game-show host in Slumdog Millionaire, focused on his film roles, as well as Indian dancing.

"He somehow made me dance," she said.

Her interviews are done in a "rapid-fire" style, meaning she throws questions at her interviewees very quickly, expecting fast, short answers. For example, before interviewing a hockey player, she planned to ask him what's the best thing about being a pro athlete, and whether he is a betting man.

Zak called the horse-racing industry very interesting, with depth beyond what the average viewer would notice. "It's like a whole other world," she said. "Someone could come to the racetrack and watch a horse race, and not realize so much happens behind the scenes."

Before university, Zak said she had no idea her career path would lead to the races. She was intrigued by the entertainment industry, but her high school guidance counsellor discouraged her from applying to Ryerson's radio and TV arts program, telling her it was too competitive.

Still, she knew she wanted to find a program more specific than a general BA, so she persevered and made it into the course.

So far, she said she has had a great time doing the work at Woodbine Entertainment, which has given her an opportunity to meet really interesting people.

"Everybody has a unique story," she said. For example, she has interviewed someone who was kicked in the face by a horse, and she worked on another story about a man who had just bought a horse. He was so excited about it that he promised to take the whole stable of more than 40 people to Vegas if he won a million-dollar race. Unfortunately for them, he didn't win.

However, these are the kinds of angles Zak looks for – often having to do more with the human-interest side of the story than horse racing itself.

That's why, despite having fallen into her role in the industry, beginning her job with little knowledge on the sport, she's been so successful. Ultimately, it comes down to finding the human side of the story.

Bet Night Live airs on The Score on Sundays at 3 p.m. and Mondays at 7 p.m.

I think he's Mr. Right, but...

Dear Ella,

I've been searching for the right man for a long time, and I think I've finally found him. Larry has a heart the size of the moon. We met during a friend's party at a club about a month ago. We left the rest of the group to have a drink on our own. He is a doll, everything I've ever wanted in a guy except for one little thing: he's separated, but he still lives under the same roof as his wife and daughter.

I know this should send up red flags, but for some reason, I trust him. He and his wife have been separated for more than seven months, but they have a young daughter together, and she's having a difficult time with daddy being gone, so Larry explained to me that his daughter must come first, and until she is stable enough, he won't leave. His daughter is seeing a therapist to help her through this, and Larry has been nothing but open and honest with me from the moment we met.

I know this isn't the ideal situation, and all my friends are telling me that I'm an idiot, but deep down, I have a really good feeling about this guy. I don't want to give him up just because the timing is bad. What do you think?

Dear Committed,

It's difficult to find the right partner these days, so I can understand your elation over finding someone you feel is a good fit. Larry does sound like he has his heart in the right place, but the right place at the moment isn't with you. It's with his daughter. Although this is very admirable, and I can see how you would be attracted to a guy who seems so loving and caring, these emotions aren't directed at you. You may think Larry is the best person, but he's not right for you, at least not right now, while he's not in the position to make any kind of commitment. You could be investing a lot of time in him and never have anything materialize. But worse than that, you could get your heart broken.

Larry is in the early stages of breaking up his family. He has so much on his plate now and going into the future that he can really use a positive, fun diversion. That's where you come in. Dating Larry will be unpredictable at best, and you could end up playing a waiting game that you may never win.

Even if Larry's daughter comes to terms with her parents' separation, there's so much for him to work out, such as living, financial, custody arrangements to mention a few. So much has to fall into place before you become Larry's priority. You deserve a guy who is ready to put you first. A good relationship means you both have to be on the same page to make it work.

Your friends are right. This isn't the right time for you and Larry. You can only work with the reality of the situation, and the reality is that he is still living under the same roof with his wife and daughter. They're still a family unit, and you don't belong—at least not right now.

Let Larry go, and move on. The longer you prolong this, the harder it will be and the more you'll be hurt.

You need to fall in love with a man who is prepared to make you No. 1 in his life. You deserve nothing less.

How important is ice cream in your life?

Most people don't think of ice cream as being particularly important in their life, but acknowledge that they enjoy eating it. For some, however, ice cream is the ultimate treat, and given the vast array of providers, each trying to reach new heights of flavour and texture, one wonders how there was a time when the choices were generally very limited.

I recall that when I was a child travelling with my parents to upstate New York or New England for a family camping trip, we stopped at a Howard Johnson's for a memorable ice cream treat: there were 28 flavours to choose from, a number beyond anything available at my neighbourhood "candy store," where there were at most 10 flavours with vanilla, chocolate and strawberry being at the top of the list.

Most of us have fond associations with the ice cream stories of our youth and the vendors that catered to us as children. We generally continue to enjoy the special taste and "treat" of ice cream into our later years.

It's because of this almost universal pleasurable association with ice cream that I have recently used it to explore the values and expressed wishes of patients afflicted with varying stages of Alzheimer's disease and other dementias. It helps families understand some of the decisions that they may have to make in the late stages of the condition.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

One of the many serious consequences of late-stage dementia, which often occurs after an acute medical event such as a serious infection, major fracture or surgery, is often rapid deterioration and the development of what is called delirium, with serious mental confusion and agitation. This state can interfere with care and may result in the person's refusal Cream together butter and sugars. Beat in eggs and vanilla. In separate bowl, whisk together flour, cocoa and baking soda; mix into creamed mixture. Chill mixture until firm (overnight). to take food and fluids by mouth.

Sometimes, inadequate intake of food and drink is just part of the general deterioration in basic bodily activities, where the person may show no interest in eating or drinking or may keep the food in the mouth for long periods without actually swallowing. At this point, whether in a hospital, a long-term care setting or a home setting, the question of "artificial hydration and nutrition" (tube feeding) may be proposed.

It is very hard for loved ones to deny the provision of food and drink, which are universally associated with love and affection. Also, the idea of "starving" their loved one is generally anathema to caring family members.

To help them understand what a feeding tube would mean, information that should inform the final decision they may have to make, I ask them how they would feel if they could never taste ice cream again and, in fact, never taste anything again, as food will go directly into the stomach without passing through the lips and mouth.

Invariably, scores of those to whom I pose this question, answer: "Are you crazy, who would want that?" or "No thank you, I wouldn't want that."

They are beginning to understand that with a feeding tube, although perhaps one may be alive, there will be none of the joys associated with eating, and this helps them look at the decision they have to make more clearly.

I tell the family, "This is the beginning of an important conversation—remember it when things are difficult and you have to make such serious decisions on behalf of this person you love."

These conversations help ensure that family members are comfortable and can live without lingering guilt because of the decision that was made.

Greek Jews fight neo-Nazi party

Gavin Rabinowitz
JTA

ATHENS — For every Jew who lives in Greece, there are about 100 Greeks who voted for the country's neo-Nazi party, Golden Dawn, last spring.

The party now controls 18 seats in Greece's 300-member parliament, and its popularity is rising rapidly. A poll taken last month showed that if elections were held again today, Golden Dawn would capture 14 per cent of the vote, making it Greece's third-largest party. A September poll showed that 22 per cent of Greeks have positive views of Golden Dawn, up from 12 per cent in May.

With its swastika-like flag, gangs of black-shirted thugs attacking immigrants and its ideology of Greek racial superiority, Golden Dawn's sudden and significant rise has prompted condemnations from around the world.

It also has put many of Greece's 5,000 Jews on edge. Community leaders already have begun a campaign to educate Greeks about the dangers of allowing a neo-Nazi party to flourish, and Greek Jews are trying to figure out what more they can do to arrest Golden Dawn's rise.

"We definitely think that a very basic tool to promoting social equality and combating the rise of extremists like Golden Dawn is educating schoolchildren," said Zanet Battinou, director of the Jewish Museum of Greece.

The museum and its programs teach visiting schoolchildren about Greece's Jewish community, its heritage and, in particular, about the Holocaust, in which more than 80 per cent of Greek Jews were murdered.

New Gig For Farber

TORONTO — Former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber has been named senior vice-president of government and external relations by Gemini Power Corporation, company president Michael Dan said last week. It's a new position at Gemini, which was founded in 2006 and develops renewable energy projects in Ontario in partnership with First Nations communities. Farber ran unsuccessfully for the Ontario Liberal party in the 2011 election in Thornhill while on leave from Congress' successor organization, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Baycrest Day On Hill

OTTAWA — York Centre Tory MP Mark Adler hosted Baycrest Day on Parliament Hill last week. The Nov. 1 event highlighted the Toronto senior centre's contribution to brain health research. It featured a breakfast speech by Baycrest president and CEO Dr. William Reichman, as well as an afternoon Jeopardy-style event titled the Great Canadian Brain Games featuring teams of MPs from all parties.

OTZMA To End

NEW YORK — The Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) is closing its OTZMA Israel program for post-college young adults. JFNA president and CEO Jerry Silverman said the program, launched in 1986, would end after the current cohort finishes its 10-month trip. "Today, there are more than 200 Israel programs for young Jewish adults, built upon OTZMA's shoulders, and many offer similarly extraordinary experiences," he said. OTZMA participants live in Israel, learn Hebrew and volunteer in small communities. More than 1,400 people have taken part, with some 60 per cent of alumni serving as professionals or volunteers in their home communities.

Antisemitic Incidents Down In U.S.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The number of antisemitic incidents in the United States declined by 13 per cent in 2011, an annual audit found.

The annual Anti-Defamation League Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents, released Nov. 1, reported of 1,080 incidents of assault, vandalism or harassment, compared to 1,239 incidents in 2010. It's the lowest number recorded by the ADL in the past two decades, the organization said. The report did show an increase, in incidents of school bullying, with Jewish students reporting being harassed and intimidated by peers using antisemitic stereotypes or comments about Nazis or the Holocaust.

The 2011 ADL audit includes incidents recorded in 45 states and Washington D.C., including 19 physical assaults on Jewish individuals; 731 cases of harassment, threats and events, and 330 cases of vandalism.

The states with the highest totals were California, New York, New Jersey and Florida, which all have large Jewish populations.

"It is encouraging that over the past five or six years we have seen a consistent decline... across the country and that the numbers are now at a historic low," said ADL national director Abraham Foxman.

Abraham Foxman

umbrella body lodged a complaint with the Anglican Church about a vicar they accuse of antisemitic speech. The Board of Deputies of British Jews targeted Rev. Stephen Sizer over content on his website, the Jewish Chronicle reported. Rev. Sizer, a senior pastor in Surrey, has twice altered his site after linking to others promoting Holocaust denial and anti-Zionist conspiracy theories. He denies he's antisemitic. It's first time the Board of Deputies has lodged a formal complaint with the church against a clergyman. The complaint will likely trigger action under a disciplinary process set out by Parliament.

stances last week in the aftermath of Hurricane Sandy.

This year's opening of Holocaust Education Week emphasized the artistic and literary representation of the Holocaust, spanning across generations and nationalities, said Mira Goldfarb, executive director of the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Torontonians flocked to the Royal Ontario Museum on Nov. 1 to hear Englander reflect on how collective memory of the Holocaust has influenced his writing and creative process, in conversation with Horowitz, the author of Voicing the Void: Muteness and Memory in reclaiming memory Holocaust Fiction.

There wasn't an empty seat in the lecture room, and two overflow rooms were set up with big screens to facilitate the overcapacity crowd.

Despite using Anne Frank's name in its title, Englander's short-story collection actually has nothing to do with Anne, at least not on the surface, and she isn't a character in any of the stories.

However, all eight short stories have the same theme: the Holocaust and how it has affected Jewish life. Anne's essence and struggle is shown through other characters.

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. As of this writing, fully six days after Hurricane Sandy crashed into the northeastern United States, some 107 people were known to have been killed by the freakishly massive force of the storm. More than two million homes and businesses were still without power. Some 8.5 million homes and businesses were without power after the storm passed last Tuesday.

Seven states – Connecticut, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and West Virginia – suffered the harshest blows of Sandy's severe punishment. According to CBS News, hurricane-related deaths were reported in five additional states, including Maryland, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Virginia and even Ohio.

The headlines last week were as shocking as some of the images that accompanied them. Typical of the headlines were "Sandy devastates Staten Island" or "Superstorm slams Jersey shore."

Some homes and some entire communities that had formerly hugged the shoreline were lifted up, blown over or tossed away like some inconvenient fleck of dirt. Human beings and the lives they had built stood in the way of the shearing winds and giant waves of water cutting a path toward an indistinct ultimate place of dissipation.

After the storm, thousands of individuals, their strength of will resummoned, as their children stood at their side, rummaged through the rubble of their homes, Sandy's detritus, looking for fragments of a lifetime from which to start again.

We saw the images.

They could have been taken from any of the climate-change disaster

We are our brothers' keepers movies produced by Hollywood in the past few years. But they were not cut and pasted from a film studio.

Nor were the images of a Third World natural disaster where water toppled spindly wooden homes or makeshift plywood huts.

Rather, they were from across the fence in our neighbour's yard.

In the very large Jewish community of Greater New York, including New Jersey, JTA reported heart-rending personal features such as "Tree felled by Sandy kills teacher, college student," or "Deluged day school, ruined Torahs and devastated communities left in Sandy's wake." (See the coverage elsewhere in this edition.)

From the editor's desk...

Our distance from the storm spared us its harm.

But we must not allow that distance to spare us from understanding and empathizing with the suffering of the storm's victims.

Even the "least" damage from the storm – a lack of electrical power, for example – can be disastrous, as the cold nights of autumn have set in to the area.

A visitor last week from Toronto to one of the Jewish neighbourhoods in Baltimore told The C/JN: "You really feel the devastation in New York here."

"Many people [in Baltimore] have children, relatives or close friends who have been without power or flooded out of their homes. Many have come here to stay with family and friends.

"I have been told that many of the people who are flooded out will not be compensated by their insurance. And after as much as 10 inches of water or sewage has been sitting in your house for a week, it's a real mess. Then there is the mould and mildew to consider.

"Shuls are collecting food, clothes, bedding, money, etc. to send to New York. A lot of Jewish families are involved. They are also sending a bus [to New York City] next week, when gas won't be as hard to find on the highway, to bring affected families back to Baltimore and Silver Spring to stay with shul members for next Shabbat."

We must all get involved.

And indeed Jewish communities in Canada and North America have done so. Federations in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg and Ottawa have established special relief funds for this purpose.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto said last week that 100 per cent of proceeds collected for the UJA Hurricane Sandy Disaster Relief Fund will be distributed by the Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) as part of a North America-wide response.

We share the sentiments and echo the words of Israeli President Shimon Peres in message he sent last week to U.S. President Barack Obama: "Our hearts go out to the people of America, and I would like to extend my deepest sympathy and condolences to the families who have lost their loved ones in this superstorm."

But, of course, in addition to feelings of sympathy and condolences, we must act. We must help, even if in small personal measures, to abate the suffering of the victims of Hurricane Sandy.

The reason we do so is because we are indeed and always will be our brothers' keepers.

Community responds to Hurricane Sandy

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has reached out to tens of thousands of people in its database to help victims of Hurricane Sandy in the Jewish and general populations.

An Oct. 30 e-mail called the hurricane "a storm of unprecedented magnitude" that left 48 people in the United States dead, and "countless more injured, homeless and unsure of what comes next."

The e-mail said that 100 per cent of proceeds collected for the UJA Hurricane Sandy Disaster Relief Fund will be distributed by the Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) as part of a North America-wide response.

JFNA offices in Manhattan and Washington, D.C., are closed in Sandy's wake, according to the JFNA's website.

Steven Shulman, UJA Federation's campaign director and counsel, told The C/JN that JFNA is working with "local Jewish federations on the ground in the affected areas, and conferring with emergency management officials to assess the damage and determine where dollars can best be allocated."

He added that members of the Jewish community "want to respond, and in particular they want to do so through an organization they trust, and at the same time make a statement about Jewish values."

As of Monday, more than $15,000 had been raised by Toronto's Jewish community for the victims of Sandy, Shulman said.

"I would expect donations to continue rather steadily as the extent of the devastation" becomes clearer to Canadian donors, he added.

To contribute to UJA Federation's fund, go to ujadonations.com/sandy, or call 416-631-5705.

Federations in Vancouver, Winnipeg and Ottawa have also set up funds, and Montreal's Federation CJA had raised $3,320 as of Monday.

Jewish Federations of Canada – UJA (JFC-UJA), which serves federated and non-federated communities, also set up a donation site at www.jewishcanada.org for people who "do not live in a federated community or if their federated community does not have its own fund," the organization said. As of Monday, it had raised more than $6,000 from communities across the country, excluding Montreal and Toronto.

In related news, two young Jews were killed in Brooklyn, N.Y., by a falling tree during the hurricane.

New group supports nature protection in Israel

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you try to call an Israeli around Passover, there's a good chance they'll be away from home on a tiyul.

More than just a hike, a tiyul combines exercise, fresh air and communing with the land. Or, as an Israeli visitor to Toronto put it recently, "exploring the land through your feet."

Facilitating the people's urge to trudge are field schools – modest guest houses –operated by the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel (SPNI), a 60-year-old organization that maps out nature trails across the country.

The NGO has a longstanding support group in the United States and it recently launched a Canadian version, the Canadian Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel. Last week, SPNI's director of foreign relations and resource development, Uri Goldflam, was in Toronto to meet with Canadian supporters and describe the good works SPNI is doing to keep Israel green and ecologically friendly. The Canadian wing of the organization is still at "the embryonic stage," he said, though it has a corporate structure and is entitled to issue tax receipts for charitable donations.

Its Canadian spokesman, Allan Shiff, said the organization wants to attract friends of Israel who have an interest in environmental issues.

In Israel, "exploring the land through your feet is branded into the Israeli culture," Goldflam said. SPNI operates field schools in Ein Gedi, Har Meron (near Safed), Achziv Beach (near Nahariya) and at the Ramon Crater in the Negev Desert, to facilitate those visits.

SPNI boasts 45,000 member households in Israel, while 800,000 people have been exposed to the organization's activities, whether hiking its trails, staying at its field schools or participating in adult education programs.

Of course, SPNI is much more than an organization that facilitates nature walks, Goldflam continued. It has a broad agenda on the environment – everything from water use to the wellbeing of flora and fauna. Right now "the biggest challenge is open space," Goldflam said.

Israel is a tiny and crowded country but one that looks to get more and more crowded in the future. In 2020 there could be as many as 11 or 12 million people living there, up from seven million today. That would make it the most densely populated country in the OECD, the 27 most economically developed countries in the world.

SPNI recognizes the need for development, but it cannot be done at the cost of Israel's open spaces and ecological integrity. "We need clean air, open space, bicycle routes. We're talking about raising the quality of life in existing cities," Goldflam said.

One proposed development SPNI opposes would see the creation of 10 communities in the Negev Desert between Beersheva and Arad.

Building new communities is part of the Zionist ethos, but SPNI would like to see Zionism defined as strengthening existing communities, not building new ones, Goldflam said.

A builder by profession, Shiff said development should only go ahead when environmental concerns are taken into account. If the water and air aren't clean, it's not just the animals that will suffer; the people will suffer."

Shiff said he became acquainted with SPNI during a hiking trip to Israel he and his wife, Helaine, took a year and a half ago. All his arrangements were made through SPNI's New York office and he wondered why there wasn't a SPNI office in Canada to facilitate trips like his.

Later, he received a call from the New York office informing him Goldflam would be visiting Toronto in May 2011.

Goldflam saw Canada as fertile ground for a support group. Canadian Jews and others are strong supporters of Israel, they care about nature and have proven to be very generous to Israeli NGOs, he said.

Goldflam met Shiff and a few others, and after a brainstorming session, they put together a plan to launch a Canadian SPNI group. The organization received its charitable tax status last June.

Creation of a local office will make it easier for Canadians to support SPNI's activities. It's also a way to get young people, who might otherwise not be supporters of Israel, to attract their interest through environmental issues, Shiff said.

"My vision is that every Jewish family... would have a stake in the nature and landscape of Israel," Goldflam added.

Loblaw products to carry only COR certification

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the C/JN

Kosher products marketed under Loblaw Companies' store brands, including President's Choice, No Name and Blue Menu, will soon carry a single kosher symbol – the COR designation of the Kashruth Council of Canada – instead of the 10 different symbols currently displayed on product packaging.

The company said it made the move, which will be phased in over the coming months, so that it could communicate with one kosher supervisory body instead of the 10 it currently deals with.

All products will continue to be supervised by their current hechsher-granting agencies, – including such prominent ones as the Orthodox Union, which oversees the OU symbol, and BC Kosher, with its BCK hechsher – but will only feature the COR symbol from now on, Loblaw said.

"This has been a couple of years in the making," said Kashruth Council spokesperson Richard Rabkin, adding that Loblaw approached the Kashruth Council, Canada's largest kosher certification body, with the idea.

Loblaw announced the change to suppliers in late September and assured them it will have little impact on the certification process, provided a company's existing kosher supervisory agency's standards are acceptable to the Kashruth Council.

Rabkin said all 10 of the current hechshers meet the Kashruth Council's standards.

If, hypothetically, another agency didn't meet COR standards and wanted to certify a Loblaw store brand product, the Kashruth Council would conduct an investigation to "see if we can get them up to our standards. If we can't, Loblaw will decide how it wants to proceed," he added.

Rabkin said the advantages to the new arrangement for both Loblaw and consumers include packaging uniformity; speeding up food manufacturing, which can be delayed by private-label agreements; and aligning with an agency that can advocate for kashrut.

He said the change won't add to costs for either manufacturers or consumers.

"No food manufacturing company has to pay us a penny," and none will be coerced into switching to COR supervision.

Rabkin added that since the announcement has just been rolled out at the manufacturer level, consumers will probably see little change on supermarket shelves for a few months. "Updating the packaging takes a lot of time... this is really the beginning of the process."

Rabbi Saul Emanuel, executive director of the Jewish Community Council of Montreal, which oversees the MK hechsher that's currently visible on many Loblaw store brand products – including No Name and President's Choice soft drinks, No Name canola oil and PC-branded herbal tea – says his organization is adopting a wait-and-see outlook to the new arrangement.

"At this stage, there's been no change in the kosher situation at these companies."

Calls to other kashrut agencies for comment were not returned by The C/JN's deadline.

Hold high the torch; cherish our values

During the first half of the last century, two world wars convulsed the western world and large parts of the rest.

Death, injury, disfigurement, untold human suffering and loss hideously marred Europe.

The War to End All Wars did no such thing.

Twenty-one years after the last shot of that war was fired in 1918, the Nazis invaded Poland. Merely days after World War II ended in 1945, smaller, regional conflicts erupted around the globe.

Canadian men and women fought in the two world wars, as well as in the "lesser" regional wars, and they have served since then in countless constructive roles in places of danger throughout the world.

Like most soldiers of most standing armies, they were and are mostly very young. So many, alas, never returned home from the wars in which they fought and the various other campaigns in which they served.

We remember them always, as we must, but especially on Remembrance Day next week.

In former times, when more of the veterans of the two Great Wars still lived among us, society would actually come to a stop even if for only one moment at the 11th hour of the 11th day of the 11th month to remember the fallen of the wars. In our schools and at public remembrance ceremonies, we recited In Flanders Fields, the poem written by Canadian Lieut.-Col. John McCrae, that has come to symbolize the ultimate sacrifice of soldiers and the human carnage of all wars.

"In Flanders fields the poppies blow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our place; and in the sky
The larks, still bravely singing, fly
Scarce heard amid the guns below.
We are the Dead.

Short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved, and were loved, and now we lie
In Flanders fields.

Take up our quarrel with the foe:
To you from failing hands we throw
The torch, be yours to hold it high.
If ye break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders fields."

Reading the poem again, we understand that we honor the memories of the fallen and remember them best by cherishing, championing and protecting the values of the way of life of the country for which they fought and died.

Nobel Peace Prize winner Elie Wiesel urged the Soviet Union to release Raoul Wallenberg as a concrete example that its Glasnost policy was meaningful. The Soviets arrested the Swedish diplomat in 1945 and said he died in prison in 1947, but some disputed that claim. Wiesel made the comments to reporters in Montreal before giving a speech that's named for Wallenberg at McGill University.

Girls, women alienated at Kotel

I was distressed reading the article "Kotel rabbi offers blessings to Canada" (Oct. 25). Rabbi Shmuel Rabinowitz speaks nicely, but his words contain continued alienation for a majority of our people. Rabbi Rabinowitz said, "Every Jewish child should have their bar mitzvah at the wall." In 1981, my family travelled to Israel on a synagogue bar mitzvah trip. I watched from afar as the boys in the group celebrated their b'nei mitzvah at the Kotel. For the girls, a service was held atop Masada. Bat mitzvah at Rabbi Rabinowitz's Kotel was not, and still is not, an option for every child.

The Kotel is a special site for me. Unfortunately, on my last trip to Israel, I felt so disconnected from the site. I had no feeling at all. Rabbi Rabinowitz calls the Kotel "the Grand Central Station of the Jewish People." I grew up in New York. Never in Grand Central Station did I feel I needed to suppress my Jewish identity and practice. I was never made to stand in a separate subway car. In Grand Central Station, I am not afraid to have my tallit and tefillin.

Rabbi Rabinowitz states that "his responsibilities include ensuring sanctity of the Kotel," and that "every note [placed in the Wall] is treated as if it were a sefer Torah." Sanctity includes caring for people at least as much as those notes. Sanctity means that all can daven at that wall, for God's house should be a house of tefillah for all people. Fortunately, today there is another option. The Robinson's Arch section of the Kotel, overseen by the Masorti movement, is open to all to gather, to pray, and to celebrate coming of age as a Jew.

Minority monopolizes holy site

It was strange for The CJN to print a front-page photo of the smiling chief rabbi of the Kotel, welcoming Canadians to celebrate bar – but not bat – mitzvahs at the Kotel, in the same week that a woman was roughly arrested for reciting the Shema at the Kotel ("Kotel rabbi offers blessings to Canada," Oct. 25). The rabbi may be happy that he is able to treat the Kotel as an ultra-Orthodox synagogue and prevent women from praying aloud, carrying a Torah or even wearing a tallit. But most of us should be outraged that the holiest site in Judaism is monopolized by a small minority and unwelcoming to most Jews. This would be a better topic for a front-page story.

Need to counter Arab propaganda

I am afraid that Lawrence Hart's call in his column for vociferous reaction to the art exhibition, A Child's View from Gaza, at the Hamilton Public Library is too little, too late (Where is our advocacy?, Nov. 1). The public was already influenced by the exhibit, and objecting to it would be viewed as "muzzling the voice of the poor people of Gaza." A more effective way is to demand an equal space and equal time to display our exhibition. Such exhibit should be readily available and should follow to counter any Arab propaganda exhibit.

Torah not susceptible to impurity

I want to clarify one point that was made in the article "Course brings Jewish and Muslim women together" (Nov. 1). Nevin Reda commented on the fact that both Judaism and Islam share similarities as far as menstrual laws go. Indeed, there is a strong taboo on sexual relations during menstruation in both traditions. However, while Islamic law exempts menstruating women from prayer and fasting and prohibits them from touching the Qur'an, there is no halachic prohibition against Jewish women praying or reading from the Torah while menstruating. Nonetheless, in some Jewish communities, such customs did persist at certain points in time, and often women did refrain from entering the synagogue during their periods. There is a persistent myth that it is because of women's "impure" status that they were prevented from reading or touching the Torah, but the Talmud is quite clear that the words of the Torah are not susceptible to impurity.

Is 'free' Judaism a good idea?

Gary Rosenblatt

Maybe I'm just jealous of the free offers being made to young Jews today, but part of me worries that down the road, these well-meaning programs and proposals – like trips to Israel, High Holiday services, books for children and Shabbat meals – may have a negative effect on a generation that is being coddled and spoiled Jewishly.

The fact is that college students and Jews in their 20s are being showered with a variety of opportunities of engagement from a Jewish community deeply concerned about its future and believing that the best way to attract the next generation is to provide benefits at no cost.

A young woman in her 20s who is actively engaged in Jewish life in New York told me she enjoys going to synagogue but would never consider paying for membership or for High Holiday seats. It's just an alien concept to her, and she doesn't have to make the choice because free services are available.

Surely free offers have appeal for the targeted audience, but is this a sign of strategic planning or desperation?

Should limited resources be focused on young people who have shown little interest in Jewish engagement rather than, say, parents who want very much for their children to have a day school education but are struggling mightily to meet increasing tuition? And who is to make these major decisions? Have communal leaders and organizations relinquished their role to the philanthropists and private foundations with the funds to generate these programs?

There are no simple, across-the-board answers, but it's a discussion the community should be having.

When we think of "free" in the American Jewish community, Birthright Israel is the first program to come to mind. For more than a decade now, this bold project, conceived by a few mega-donors and now supported as well by Jewish federations and the government of Israel, has brought Jews between the ages of 18 and 26 to Israel for 10 days free of charge. The results have been incredible.

Not only have more than 350,000 Diaspora young people participated, but studies show that the impact of the trip on their attitudes toward Israel and their Jewish identity have been significant and positive.

An early skeptic, I now am a major believer in the program, having gone on two trips myself and seen the transformation that takes place among these young people. But it doesn't have to be completely free.

Some Birthright programs, like those for South American Jews, have established a practice where participants take the modest $250 deposit they put down for the trip and return it to the program when they come home. And that seems to be working just fine, with "a very high rate of participants" giving back, according to a Birthright spokesperson.

I was pleased to learn recently that North American participants now get an email about a month after their return from Israel with directions on how to get the refund of their $250 deposit and asking if they would like to donate it, or a portion of it, back. Fifteen to 20 per cent of alumni donate a portion or all of their deposit, the spokesperson said.

If everyone donated the deposit, it would increase the coffers of the highly costly program by about $10 million a year. Perhaps more importantly, it would create a model for Jewish giving for young people who have been conditioned to expect things for free, from pop music to news online.

The Torah provides us with a paradigm here. When the Israelites were in the desert, God commanded that they each contribute a half shekel, in part for census keeping and in part to maintain the mishkan, the portable sanctuary. The overarching message was that everyone is counted by being a contributor, even through a modest amount. It's a lesson that still applies.

We need to recognize that the prevalent notion in our society is that cost equals value. In our daily lives as consumers we've come to believe that we pay for what is important to us and see "free" offers as a come-on with hidden expenses down the line.

David Bryfman of the Jewish Education Project in New York focused on the "free" issue in an ELI talk (the Jewish equivalent of TED talks) and in his writings recently, suggesting that "the value of Jewish life and living has been... distorted by the increasing addition of free initiatives," which he believes can have unintended but "potentially devastating consequences."

He argues that "free adds value only if it is connected to something else." Because someone else is paying for it, it isn't sustainable, and it isn't really free. "And when [donors] are paying for one thing, it often means that they are not paying for something else."

David Cygielman, the CEO and founder of Moishe House, an international organization that subsidizes rent for single young Jews in return for their promise to host events with Jewish content, wrote a piece on the ewJewishPhilanthropy website recently saying it's a mistake and missed opportunity to downplay the significant cost absorbed by funders underwriting these "free" programs.

"If my peers... are being taught that everything is free, how can we expect them to give back down the road?" he asked.

In his essay, called "The Myth of Free," Cygielman said Moishe House launched a campaign that makes its budget transparent so residents and alumni can see the level of philanthropic support the program receives. More than two-thirds of Moishe House residents contributed to the program last year, and Cygielman suggests that "sharing our budget and being transparent" was a key factor.

"Free," in and of itself, is neither a good nor bad policy, according to Mark Charendoff, former head of the Jewish sumers are pleased, asking them for donations. That formula, and raising large sums from wealthy donors, the vast majority of whom are not ritually observant, has made Chabad the envy of every Jewish organization.

But with a number of major foundations concentrating on young people, many other segments of the community are finding it increasingly difficult to raise funds for their projects.

One frustrated rabbi seeking support for a major adult Jewish education program told me recently that "people over 40 in our community are the walking dead," virtually unnoticed by significant funders.

Of course it's the funders' prerogative to decide who and what to support, but that brings us back to whether the community as a whole has a say as to which programs are free and which aren't.

A final note to Jewish leaders: don't judge the Jewish commitment of our Young North Americans land in Israel as participants in the Taglit Birthright program

Funders Network. He says the key is the rationale and intention of the donor. Citing the Birthright program, he suggests that the donors' goal is not simply to give young people a free trip to Israel, but to lead them on a path where they come to appreciate the values of Jewish life.

"If they get a taste of it [through the Israel experience], they may become lifetime consumers," says Charendoff, noting that the donors "have confidence in their product," which is Jewish life.

Chabad has been remarkably successful around the world in providing free services and courses and, once their con-young people by whether or not they join synagogues and longstanding Jewish organizations. They are of a new generation, with multiple interests and identities, and they tend to express their Jewishness by rolling up their sleeves rather than pulling out their wallets.

They will give of themselves if they believe in the authenticity of a cause. It's our job to show them that Jewish life is a cause well worth investing in.

So take my advice. It's free.

To everything a season

I just finished reading Adam Gopnik's Winter: Five Windows on the Season (Massey Lectures, 2011). I know – I'm either way behind or a bit ahead of that part of the year, but his lectures got me thinking about the change in seasons we are undergoing right now.

We out here in La-La Land have rejoiced in the most wonderful, warm autumn in recent memory. For Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, we saw delightful sunshine, while on Sukkot, most days and evenings, one could sit in the sukkah without earmuffs. Instead of grey and gloom, we had light!

In Israel, the climax of these holidays is a ceremony called Ber Hashoevah, the water-drawing ceremony, held at the site of the spring that long ago fed a vital pool of water at the foot of Jerusalem's City of David.

The Mishnah records ecstatic celebrations that took place on the last evening, as throngs danced, prayed and pleaded for rain after a long, arid summer. They stood, if you will, at the corner of dread and desire. An outsider would be forgiven if he were confused: are they beseeching the God of Israel or the goddess of nature? As the season changed, the fate of the next agricultural year hung between heaven and the dry earth. No rain meant hunger, and perhaps fam-

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

ine. Only rain would assure a sturdy and plentiful crop.

No wonder we ask for the rain to fall. Exiled from Eretz Israel, Jews still retained prayers for abundant rain, even without access to the land.

The rabbis of the Talmud did well to shift the emphasis on Sukkot and Simchat Torah from waiting for rain to the receiving of Torah, which would satisfy our thirst for spiritual nourishment just as rain did for crops. The result was to focus the fall celebration on the moment when the membrane between physical needs and spiritual thirst is thinnest.

As with all three pilgrimage festivals (the Shalosh Regalim), we invoke the redemption of the messianic era: on Sukkot, we pray "renew for us the sukkah/kingdom of David, fallen" and to be restored at the end of all seasons.

Annually, Vancouver rabbis remind their flocks that the prayer is for Israel, not the Pacific Rim.

Who needs to pray for that which falls from the heaven without prayer? However, this year we gloried in the postponement of the wet.

We enjoyed an autumn rarely seen, one in which maples and other trees have presented intense reds and yellows, russet and golden in the sun. It's all the more striking when these trees are nestled among what one local columnist calls "fifty shades of green." Particularly amazing was our recent ferry trip from Vancouver to Victoria, past island inlets where the contrasts were most vivid. We sailed past an island ferry nestled up to a harbour teat, the whole picture framed by an array of green, gold and scarlet.

Lately, snow has appeared on the far mountains. At the shoreline, brilliant colors still make a unique contrast.

Autumn also signifies the season of aging, when we decline into frail old age. However when John Donne contemplated change in seasons in his poem The Autumnall, he compared autumn to the changes we undergo in our relationships as we age. Donne made beautiful his beloved's season of maturity: "nature did blesse her youth with ages glory."

It's now time to enter the dark time of the year. Fall colours can't stave off the winter. We're moving from a season of hope to a season of dread and darkness, cold and ice, the season that shaped Gopnik's reflections.

So, rain, Torah wisdom of age, season of hope – autumn is all of these.

And after all, when winter comes, can spring be far behind?

Our changing relationship with authority

I vote in two federal elections, Canadian and American. I consider it a privilege and a responsibility. Recently, it has been a difficult choice because of all the negativity. The U.S. presidential race especially has emphasized the negative qualities and actions of both candidates.

Yet my obligation is to find a candidate to vote for to whom I will yield authority over my country and myself. This isn't an easy or casual task.

When citizens elect an official, especially a president or prime minister, they authorize that person to act on their behalf, to legislate or to yield power over them in order to ensure the functioning of the country, or more generally to guarantee the common good. Giving someone about whom I know mostly negative traits the right to command or the power to enforce obedience is a frightening or absurd mission.

Thankfully, in most democratic societies, the power given to control and legislate is not unilateral or absolute. Founding elders were wiser than current publicists. They established checks and balances on the power of any executive. So while this may get in the way of some reform and quick action, it also protects the electorate from the absolute authority of an authoritarian official.

But we do yield authority in elections, and the issue is a valid one. It's especially important to consider where authority lies and where it's valid.

For example, parents have authority over their children, but that dominion is currently being challenged. In previous generations, no one doubted a father's right even obligation to "take the strap" to a wayward child. Now we hear of laws that ban spanking. What does that mean to our society? We have engaged a new level of government control – a level of government interference, some say.

But we also reveal a level of concern for children and child abuse. Children are no longer seen as the property of their parents. Parents may be the "authors" of the children, but they don't retain sole authority. Yet they're expected to raise, feed, clothe, protect, mould, train, etc. There's a mixed message in that bag that's not yet sorted out. At this moment, we could say that authority is shared, but the route is unclear and the results unknown.

What other levels of authority in our lives are at play as modern notions of power over people are being redefined?

Education is an interesting field in which the relationship between teacher and student is being renegotiated. In the past, the teacher had absolute authority in the classroom. No one doubted her or his jurisdiction in the room or her command over text and people. But that's no longer the case.

Now there's a contract that one must gently finesse. Students rate the teacher's performance. They can complain about any aspect of the situation, from her command of the subject matter – implicitly accepting

Norma Baumele Joseph
in Montreal

the fact that they know enough to judge this – or his classroom preparation or any part of the course. Of course, the teacher still marks students, which is a form of power over them.

But many teachers avoid the authoritative approach and opt for a shared classroom experience. Yet the educational experience is at times based on the authority of the teacher as an expert in a specific field. What is gained and lost in this new non-authoritative approach?

In Judaism, we have a mixed bag of legal and non-legal issues. The believing Jew has a sense of God as Creator having authority over oneself, and the entire world for that matter. In halachic terms, the issue is confusing. The law is the authority, but there's no one rabbi who has authority over the individual Jew. Rabbis are learned in the law, so some experts can be seen as authoritative legalists. But that doesn't automatically give them personal authority over individuals.

Jews are directly responsible to God. There are no intermediaries. That's our strength. When you ask a direct question to a specific rabbi, then by definition you accept that rabbi's authority for that issue. But many people today fear individual responsibility in life, and, therefore, they accept the authority of a specific rabbi in all things.

The face of Judaism is changing, and with it, that fierce independence of the individual might be disappearing.

German army was a 'criminal organization'

It was a remarkable discovery. In 2001, while in London, German historian Sonke Neitzel stumbled upon a thick bundle of files at the British National Archives that offered new insights into the mindset of German soldiers who had fought during World War II.

Neitzel, a University of Glasgow faculty member, was familiar with reports pertaining to interrogations of German prisoners of war, particularly U-boat crewmen. But he had never heard of a covert program in which the Allies had secretly recorded the conversations of German POWs.

Yet that's precisely what he found while reading some 800 pages of meticulously transcribed conversations of about 14,000 German soldiers who had been covertly bugged by the British and Americans.

"I was electrified," he said. The transcriptions were declassified in 1996, but no one recognized their historical value until Neitzel appeared.

Shortly afterward, he discovered that the National Archives in Washington, D.C., held an even larger collection of such material.

Teaming up with German social psychologist Harald Welzer, Neitzel has written a book that draws a chilling and definitive portrait of the soldiers who served in the Wehrmacht, the German army, during the war.

Originally published in German, Soldaten: On Fighting, Killing and Dying (McClelland & Stewart) was released on Sept. 25.

As Neitzel said in a recent interview, it offers empirical proof that the Wehrmacht under Adolf Hitler's overall command was a "criminal organization."

By his estimate, the Wehrmacht murdered about 20,000 Jews in the former Soviet Union and supported Einsatzgruppen units in the killing of more than one million Russian, Ukrainian and Baltic Jews.

In addition, he noted, Wehrmacht soldiers killed some 20,000 Jews in Poland and other Nazi-occupied countries.

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

"The [transcripts] make it clear that practically all German soldiers knew or suspected that Jews were being murdered en masse," the authors write in Soldaten.

The supposition that Germany's army fought a "clean" war was exploded by a 1990s exhibition in Germany, Crimes of the Wehrmacht, which sparked a nation-wide debate.

Compiled by the Hamburg Institute for Social Research, it's widely regarded as having marked the end of the myth that the Wehrmacht emerged from the war with its hands unsoiled.

Neitzel, 44, says the Wehrmacht participated in the murder of Jews as executioners, witnesses, accomplices and support workers. Only on very rare occasions did Wehrmacht officers intervene to stop atrocities.

Soldiers in the Wehrmacht, having been bombarded by Nazi state propaganda that depicted Jews as outsiders and even sub-humans, had grown accustomed to regarding them as the enemy.

Although most Germans supported the regime's antisemitic laws and applauded the forced emigration of German Jews, German soldiers on the front lines viewed the murder of Jews as something bad, a line that had been crossed and a shameful blot on German history, said Neitzel, editor of the academic journal German History in the 20th Century.

And yet, some soldiers in the 17-million-strong Wehrmacht proved to be heartless, cold-blooded killers.

Murdering Jews gave them something of a vicarious thrill. "They had the power of life and death," said Neitzel, whose late father, born in 1930, was a true believer in the Nazi system. "You do it because you can do it."

In Soldaten, the authors write, "Soldiers were only interested in carrying out their tasks, not questioning them."

At the end of the day, Neitzel agreed, the crimes against humanity these soldiers committed in Germany's name are a devastating commentary on the enduring consistency of human nature.

"It's a big illusion to think that 'clean' wars can be waged. Atrocities in wars are unavoidable." In wartime conditions, he added, mass violence, including rapes, is common. "The banality of war is astonishing. Future wars will be no different."

The transcripts laid bare the attitudes of soldiers, who came from all walks of life and regions, and represented a rainbow of political convictions.

"The sample is not representative in a statistical sense, but gives the richest picture of the mentalities of soldiers ever recorded," he said.

By his estimate, only 0.3 per cent of the transcripts refer to Jews, but they speak volumes.

As he and Welzer write, "Many of [the soldiers] are antisemites, but that is not identical with being Nazis. Nor does antisemitism have anything to do with willingness to kill."

A substantial number of the soldiers hate 'the Jews,' but are shocked at the mass executions [of Jews] by firing squads. Some are clear anti-Nazis, but support the anti-Jewish policies of Hitler's regime."

They add: "Most of the soldiers are scarcely interested in ideology, politics, world orders, and anything of that nature. They wage war not out of conviction, but because they are soldiers and fighting is their job."

The majority of Wehrmacht soldiers had what is perhaps a unique definition of war crimes, defining them as the murder of women, children and POWs. And yet German troops killed upward of 3.3 million Soviet POWs, not to mention Jewish civilians, he said.

Neitzel maintains that virtually every German civilian adult was at least dimly aware of the Holocaust, though their knowledge of the telling details was limited.

"They knew that Jews were being put on trains bound for the east, and that they were not coming back."

Germans obtained their information from soldiers, railway workers and bureaucrats. "There were a lot of rumours."

Long before Crimes of the Wehrmacht startled Germans, scholars such as Neitzel were keenly aware that the Wehrmacht had compromised itself. Nonetheless, the German edition of Soldaten angered some Germans.

"We were accused of being traitors," he recalled.

Their detractors, primarily right-wing Germans, claimed the Allied transcripts were rank forgeries.

JCT to honour federal minister

Institution helps haredi, Orthodox students obtain skills to join the workforce

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

John Baird

The Jerusalem College of Technology (JCT), one of Israel's main institutions of higher learning geared towards the Orthodox community, will bestow an honorary degree on Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird on Nov. 25.

A gala dinner at Toronto's Ritz-Carlton hotel will recognize Baird's "unwavering support for Israel and his role in making Canada an example of international responsibility and morality," according to the Canadian Friends of the JCT.

Speaking to The C/N in advance of the event, Shimon Vinger, executive director of the college's Canadian fundraising chapter, said the institution plays a vital role in Israel in helping haredi and Orthodox students obtain skills to join the workforce.

Established in 1969, the college produces graduates with marketable skills in the engineering, high-tech and business management fields while providing instruction in Torah. It has recently begun focusing on helping solve some of Israel's societal issues surrounding the productivity of haredi populations.

Haredi students now comprise a full one-third of the college's 4,000-plus student body.

"Our niche is the combo of tech, applied sciences and the study of Jewish heritage," Vinger said. "We feel it's good for the [haredi] students and their families if they qualify for our programs."

"Our [college] answers a societal need in Israel, and we're positioned well to provide haredim a door to contribute more to Israeli society. Israel has this need to help the growing haredi community enter the workforce and institutions on every level."

Vinger said JCT is often compared in programming to the Technion - Israel Institute of Technology, with the added bonus of Torah study.

In 2011, the college honoured Minister of Citizenship and Immigration Jason Kenney with a similar award at a dinner. That event raised more than $900,000 for JCT.

Vinger said his organization hopes to surpass that total this year.

Asked whether JCT had any joint initiatives or exchange programs with Canadian universities or institutions, Vinger said the college would like to "do partnership programs with Canadian hospitals or high-tech institutions" but nothing has been formalized so far.

Baird told The C/N it will be an honour to receive recognition from the college.

"Israel is one of the most innovative countries in the world, and every time I visit, I marvel at the ingenuity of its people," Baird said.

"This award should not signify my commitment to the state of Israel, but instead, should highlight the commitment of the Canadian people to a free, peaceful and prosperous Israel."

Weizmann Institute to open new research centre

Weizmann faculty member looks to future at annual meeting

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

Dr. Ido Amit envisions a future in which doctors can tailor individualized treatment plans for diseases based on a person's genetic makeup.

His lab at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel is researching "personalized medicine," the understanding of how an individual's genetic makeup determines one's immune response to diseases and treatments.

In the Weizmann Institute newsletter, Amit explained that researchers have identified a strong genetic predisposition for breast cancer, and now they believe they can predict how cancer patients will respond to chemotherapy based on their own genomes.

"This has a lot of predictive value – we could know what our children might be susceptible to," said Amit at the Weizmann Canada national annual meeting on Oct. 25. "This is what the future holds."

Now the Weizmann Institute is working to establish the Israel National Center for Personalized Medicine, a state-of-the-art research institute that will focus on understanding the roles genes play in diseases and its treatments. Amit believes that will completely change the way medicine is practiced.

His mission is to create "accurate missiles to treat people's diseases, and not something else." His research has been getting worldwide attention: In 2009, the Journal Science said his research, which revealed new regulatory circuits that control the immune system, was a scientific breakthrough.

Jacqueline Craig, International Summer Science Institute Scholarship Winner with Sharon Zuckerman, International Summer Science Institute Scholarship Supporter.

"Every cell in our body has the same genomes, the same information but we express lenses only in our eyes not in our legs," he said. "This is achieved by the fact that we have special regulatory mechanisms that activate the right gene at the right time at the right place."

To raise funds for the new centre, Weizmann Canada is launching a major fundraising initiative.

Founded in 1964, Weizmann Canada is part of a worldwide network that supports, funds and raises awareness about the work done by the Weizmann Institute in Israel.

In addition, it nurtures future scientists and researchers in Canada through programs like its Math-by-Mail program, an extracurricular math program for grade 3 to 8 students; its Shalheveth Freier Physics Tournament, in which high school students compete to win a trip to Israel; and its Dr. Bessie F. Lawrence International Summer Science Institute program, which sends senior high school students to work with researchers at the Weizmann Institute in Israel.

While it is hoping to raise $8 million dollars to refurbish and equip the new centre, Weizmann Canada also wants to people to become aware that medical breakthroughs like Amit's can affect anyone personally.

Weizmann Canada's national annual meeting was called "Let's get personal," and its board members, national presidents and supporters spoke about how this research is personal to them.

"It's unique in the way it provides me with an opportunity to get involved in areas of research that speak to me personally, that it affects the future we're hoping to create for our children," said Carolyn Cohen, a Toronto board member.

Amit doesn't take all the credit for his work. He said personalized medicine has been around for a long time, but the new centre's multidisciplinary approach and its advanced technology will allow his team to significantly increase the speed of discovering and testing new theories about the treatment of specific diseases.

"The changes in our genomes are what usually make us different," said Amit. "If we can understand that, then we can treat people with personalized drugs, instead of just general treatments."

Spiritual leader helps build a stronger community

Habonim honours Rubenstein for 25 years of service

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Eli Rubenstein is being honoured on Nov. 11 for his many years of dedication to the Jewish community, and his synagogue, Congregation Habonim.

His synagogue is bestowing the honour in the 25th year of Rubenstein's service as a spiritual leader to the congregation, along with recognizing the long service of Cantor Esther Ghan-Firestone and her accompanist Larry Clements.

"Eli's a true Jewish leader, and because of his longevity in the shul, I think the congregation felt it was appropriate," said Avrum Rosensweig, associate religious leader for Congregation Habonim.

Rosensweig called him a bit like the piper in the way he attracts the people he meets.

"He's a very funny person, and I think when he works with young people and adults, he brings out the best in them," he said.

Rubenstein, who has worked with many bar and bat mitzvah students over the past several decades, said he loves to work with young people to inspire them and help their reach their full potential.

"In my life, I often meet people who don't realize the potential and ability they have," he said. "How wonderful it is to help them grow into the person they don't necessarily know they can be."

Twenty-five years ago, then-president of Habonim, Gangolf Herman, did the same to him. The rabbi at the time had announced his resignation, and so Herman begged Rubenstein to take over the synagogue, telling him it was his duty and responsibility given that Holocaust survivors built the synagogue, and they feared without Rubenstein's help, the synagogue would disappear, Rubenstein said.

He agreed to help out until they found someone more permanent. But 25 years later, he's still there. "I realized that I was able to fashion a kind of Judaism that worked for me and the community," he said. "We've created a very safe space for people of a variety of backgrounds."

He said inclusiveness is incredibly important to his life, and his synagogue.

"There's enough strife and criticism and pettiness outside, let's not take that into the synagogue," he said.

That's an attitude he's held through all areas of his life, Rosensweig said. "Eli seems to cross all boundaries. I'm not sure how he does that, but I don't think he sees lines between people."

For example, he has integrated himself into the community on Christian Island, where he owns a house. The island, located in Georgian Bay, is mostly inhabited by First Nations people.

Bonnie Sylvester lives on the island, and has known Rubenstein for about five years. She said he is very hospitable, allowing people to stay in his home whenever they need it, noting one time during a family tragedy when he opened his doors to her visiting family.

"He talks a lot," she said (a sentiment that Rosensweig echoed), "and he's friendly and we got to know him very well. He taught me a lot about his culture, and he would ask us a lot of questions about ours."

Rubenstein is also national director of the March of the Living, an educational trip for young adults and high school students to learn about the Holocaust.

He originally became involved with the organization when he noticed that applicants tended to echo his own questions about the Holocaust, such as how it could have happened.

Since then, he's realized that he was asking the wrong question: Why did the Holocaust happen? He came to the conclusion that it could never be answered satisfactorily, so he encourages participants to ask another question.

"How do we respond to the Holocaust?" he said. "By building a more loving, caring, compassionate world. By building a stronger Jewish community, a stronger Israel and reaching out to smaller communities – people who are now considered the 'others.'"

This is the underlying theme in Rubenstein's work, as well as his thought that no matter who or where you are, you can learn from the people around you.

"Wherever I am... there's an opportunity to learn from another human being, to sharing and working together," he said. "It makes a huge difference in our lives, and the lives of others."

He insisted he has received much more than he has given to the people he's helped.

"Everyone has challenges, we all have issues and we've helped each other out," he said, emphasizing that the people around him are always willing to help him when he needs it.

For that, his response to the synagogue's tribute to him is one of gratitude.

"I think it's me who should be thanking the community for 25 years," he said, "because over 25 years, I've experienced the most extraordinary love and kindness."

When it comes to the vital responsibility of building Jewish identity, caring for our most vulnerable, and standing with the people of Israel, it takes a very special group of people.

'In the event of a second Holocaust, who would hide us?'

Englander grew up in New York and was part of an Orthodox community in West Hempstead. He told the crowd that as a youth he often wondered, "In the event of a second Holocaust, who would hide us?" He said this was a recurring thought to him.

Though Englander's stories are fiction, he said they are based on truth. "Made up, it is, but that doesn't mean it's not real," he said. The stories may be fiction, but they are based on his experiences.

The stories may be fiction, but they are based on his experiences

Although writers are frequently advised to "write about what you know," Englander said that growing up in the suburbs, he was frightened at the prospects of being trapped in a "literary suburb." Instead, he decided to write about what he knew, but in a different way.

For example, Englander reasoned that yearning for an Atari video game system on his bar mitzvah taught him what it was like to yearn, and he used that experience later in life to understand what it was like to "yearn" for freedom – a major theme in his stories.

The 32nd annual Holocaust Education Week, which ends today, brought many other speakers and events to Toronto, all focusing on the theme the "culture of memory."

"Reflecting upon the culture of memory invites new audiences and new generations to engage in a subject that is universal and continues to be so relevant in today's world," Goldfarb said.

"The programs are diverse and compelling, offering multiple points of entry and dialogue."

She said UJA Federation hopes to inspire a new generation to get involved in Holocaust education through the programming.

Veteran, 91, sells poppies with pride

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

This month is significant for Morris Polansky in two ways.

With Remembrance Day approaching on Nov. 11, the personable 91-year-old Canadian army veteran has been spending much of his time distributing poppies to Toronto schools and subway commuters. He is first vice-president and poppy campaign chair of the Royal Canadian Legion's General Wingate Branch 256, its only Jewish branch.

"We want people to wear this poppy with pride, because this is the poppy that's used to remember all those people who gave their lives for our country and for freedom," he told The CJN.

As well, this month, Polansky is celebrating an adult bar mitzvah, reading a Haftorah for the first time. Growing up on a farm in Oxbow, Sask., about 180 miles from Regina, he had no formal Jewish education, nor did he have a bar mitzvah.

He and his brothers were the only Jewish children their age, although there were four other Jewish families in town. Polansky got along well with his non-Jewish peers, he said, but recalls antisemitism on the part of adults.

A retired electrical engineer, he said he could easily have become a farmer, but he disliked farming "with a vengeance."

Polansky's paternal grandparents immigrated from Ukraine in 1892, and homesteaded in Saskatchewan, where Polansky's father grew up and became a farmer, too.

As a teenager during the Depression, Polansky would leave home in the summer to work in prairie harvest fields, threshing grain, milking cows and driving a team of horses.

In 1940, after finishing high school, he left for Winnipeg and joined the Canadian Army.

"I was in Canada a little more than a year for basic training," he said.

Because he had expressed an interest in becoming an electrician, he learned to work on military vehicles before being posted to England. He also served in Italy, France and Belgium, arriving in Holland by the time the war was over. He returned home Dec. 31, 1945.

After the war, Polansky attended the University of Manitoba, graduating as an electrical engineer.

His mother, who had immigrated from Russia to Brandon, Man., at age 14, was instrumental in setting him up with his late wife, Bea. Living in Winnipeg during the war, Polansky's mother became "chummy" with a young Jewish woman, who was working at a department store.

Bea agreed to her future mother-in-law's request to write to Polansky. He proposed six months after returning to Canada. As one of many veterans who returned to school, Polansky found that jobs were scarce when he graduated in 1950. "I tramped the streets... It was most discouraging."

His first job was a non-engineering position at Ontario Hydro, and he was happy to get it, he said. By this time, he and Bea had a young child, the first of their two daughters.

Before long, he had a new job at the Canadian Standards Association (CSA), where he worked for almost 35 years before retiring in 1986.

The Polanskys raised their children in a house near then-fledgling Congregation Beth Am on Keele Street between Sheppard and Wilson avenues, which later became part of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

Bea, who had a more traditional Jewish background than her husband, encouraged him to become involved in synagogue life. He eventually became president of the congregation. Polansky credits his mother for bringing Judaism into his childhood home. "She insisted on kosher meat... and [tried] to keep a kosher home to the best of her ability."

When the cold weather came, several Jewish families would arrange to bring the shochet down from the Jewish colony of Hirsch, Sask., 25 miles away, to kill their chickens, he said.

Polansky's youth on the farm may have contributed to his vigour as a nonagenarian – he is a golfer and walks regularly – but he "put[s] it down to being lucky."

"Being active is my choice, I guess... I enjoy it."

Prof's screed on TV series slanders Jews

A popular, Emmy award-winning TV drama series, Homeland, has recently attracted a lot of attention for another reason – controversial charges that it promotes anti-Arab and anti-Muslim stereotypes.

The show, seen in North America and in Britain, is based on a hugely successful Israeli series called Harufim. Homeland deals with the terrorist threat to the United States by an American soldier who returns home as a "sleeper" after having been "turned" during eight years of captivity and torture following his capture in Afghanistan by Al Qaeda.

In his Oct. 27 column "Homeland: Is Obama's favourite show racist?" John Doyle, the Globe and Mail's TV critic, drew attention to Joseph Massad, an associate professor of modern Arab politics and intellectual history at Columbia University.

As Doyle notes, Massad "heaped scorn" on Homeland in an Al Jazeera blog for what he considers to be its blatant racism against Muslims. Doyle cites a couple of lines from Massad's 3,000-plus-word piece without passing any critical judgment on the quality or validity of Massad's complaint. Apparently in reference to Massad's title at Columbia, Doyle refers to Massad only as a "scholar."

However, when one looks carefully at what Massad has written on the Al Jazeera site, questions immediately arise about just what sort of scholar he is.

It's one thing for Massad to raise strong objections about what he takes to be extreme anti-Muslim stereotyping (something Jews in particular should understand, given their justified sensitivity to negative portrayals of themselves as a people). But it's quite another matter when Massad unfurls his critique by engaging in the bashing of Jews and Israel. (Here, Massad has quite a track record, including instances at Columbia, where Jewish students have formally complained about hostility they've encountered in his class when they've expressed views that don't accord with his.)

Massad begins his lengthy article with an acknowledgment of the abundant critiques that have long appeared about how Arabs have been misrepresented by Hollywood and on American TV. He then immediately segues to his main target: Israel and the confluence, he alleges, between "racist" Israel and "racist" America: "Just as Israeli racist representations of Arabs are a reflection of an overall Israeli Jewish structural racism that pervades every aspect of Israeli Jewish society, American media racism is also just a branch of a larger American racism and racialism on which much of American culture, history, and national identity is based."

There isn't space in this column to even begin to rebut Massad's vile, invidious characterization of Israel. But the sheer extremism in his language alone, including his repeated references to and emphasis on "Jewish" racism (even if couched as "Israeli Jewish" racism), should signal to any fair-minded reader that something is seriously, if not dangerously, askew in Massad's complaint.

For Massad, Homeland is immeasurably tainted by its association with the Israeli series upon which it's based. Doyle grasps this as he quotes a line that he identifies as Massad's "main point": "The racist representation of Arabs is so exponential, even for American television (and this is clearly the manifest effect of the Israeli Jewish identity of the show) that one does not know where to begin."

Before long, "Israeli Jewish" yields to just "Jewish" in Massad's piece, as he incessantly reminds readers that one of the Homeland characters, Saul Berenson, is the "American Jew Saul Berenson" or simply the "Jewish Berenson," and so on ad nauseum.

In a particularly revealing passage, which hints at the perverse nature of Massad's mind, Massad mentions that "the Jewish Berenson" is married to a "brown" woman, a Hindu Indian, a union that suggests "the Indian Hindu-Israeli Jewish right-wing alliance against Arabs and Muslims in the minds of the scriptwriters."

Similar absurdities pile up throughout the remainder of article, to such a degree as to render the honorific of "scholar" laughable.

If only Massad's message weren't so pernicious.

Mom's advocacy pays off: disabled boy attends class

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Two weeks ago, on Oct. 20, 10-year-old Jacob Trossman began to attend Elkhorn Public School three full days a week, after seven months of advocacy by his mother, Marcy White.

In late August, The C/N reported that the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) wouldn't allow the youngster to attend the school more than one half-day a week, as he did last year for the first time. Jacob has Pelizaeus-Merzbacher Disease and can't walk or talk.

His first week attending three days was "amazing," White said. His friends at the school "just flocked to him." One boy started to read him a book, and a group of boys asked to take him out to the playground after lunch, she said.

"From the first day, the kids were thrilled, and he was thrilled. For anybody that was concerned about a transition period, it's been nothing but big smiles and lots of laughter," White said.

"All I want is for my son to have the academic and social education he deserves," White said in an interview in August. She added that there were no children his age at his cognitive level at Sunny View Public School, where he is part of a program that works on communication in partnership with Holland Bloorview Kids Rehabilitation Hospital. Jacob is at his age level cognitively, his mother said.

As well as the social benefits, White is pleased that Jacob is learning from a standard curriculum with his fellow students at Elkhorn.

She credited the TDSB's Sandy Spyropoulos and her team for the new development. White said she'd been working with Spyropoulos and her team since the beginning of the school year.

Spyropoulos, who is chief academic officer for special education programs and student support services, told The C/N in an email she could not discuss individual student cases, but that she is happy that everything worked out.

The TDSB ensured that proper supports were in place at the school for Jacob, and no construction had to take place, White said.

At one point, she was told that Elkhorn needed a ramp in order for Jacob to attend the school. However, the school already had a ramp and even a disabled parking spot, she said in August.

Reflecting on her persistence in the past months, White said, "I kept persevering, because I knew it was the right thing for him."

Going Gold – Kol HaKavod!

Kol Hakavod to Noam Gershoni for his inspirational and monumental achievement!

Noam, 28, a former Apache Helicopter pilot, who was critically wounded during the Second Lebanon War, won a gold medal in wheelchair tennis at the 2012 London Paralympics.

Noam's accomplishments are even more heroic, given the challenges that he has faced in his young life. During the Second Lebanon War, Noam was severely wounded in his spinal cord, arms and legs when the helicopter he was flying crashed into another helicopter and plummeted to the ground.

After many months of hospitalization and rehabilitation, Noam visited Beit Halochem Tel Aviv, and remembers being captivated by the wheelchair tennis program there. He had never played before and decided to give it a try.

“I began playing wheelchair tennis for the fun of it but didn't think for one moment I'd make it to such high levels.”

"Noam stood out from the very first of his training sessions and it was clear we were dealing with a very talented young man. Three times a week, he trains hard, works out at the fitness hall and receives specialized physiotherapy," says his Beit Halochem coach, Nimrod Bichler.

Noam's determination and devotion led him to win a gold medal after only four years of playing. Noam credits the dedication of the coaches and staff at Beit Halochem for his success at the Paralympics.

Beit Halochem Centres in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem, Nahariya and Beer Sheva offer a broad array of specialized therapies, sports programs, cultural and social activities enabling our 51,000 Wounded Heroes to return to meaningful and productive lives.

This summer, Noam Gershoni won a gold medal in the men's singles quad tennis tournament at the 2012 Paralympic Games in London. Noam trains three times a week at Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv and also receives physiotherapy there.

Please ASSIST the more than 51,000 disabled war veterans and victims of terror who turn to Beit Halochem for their rehabilitation.

Anti-Israel student changes sides

Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Dylan Hanley is an unlikely person to be advising Jewish university students on Israel advocacy. In the first place, he is a Canadian of Irish ancestry who had no connection to Israel or Jews while growing up in Calgary.

What makes his recent presence at a Hillel program in Winnipeg even more bizarre is that he used to be the leader of Students for Palestine in his younger days at the University of Calgary.

Today, he is the Toronto-based Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' associate director of University Relations and also serves as director of Canadian Academics for Peace in the Middle East.

Addressing the student gathering in Winnipeg on Oct. 30, Hanley noted that when he was 23, he had never met anyone of the Jewish faith.

Hanley's introduction to anti-Israel and other radical leftist activity came as an undergraduate. "At 19, some young people tend to gravitate to the extreme left politically as a way to stand out," he said. "You are in effect saying to your parents that you know what they don't know — that the system is flawed."

He described the anti-Israel issue as part of the cocktail that makes up the extreme left-wing platform. He also fought against globalization, for example.

"You find people on the far left are reflexively anti-Israel," he said. "We were frequently exposed to images and literature outlining Israel's human rights' abuses against the Palestinians."

He adds that the far left doesn't really understand the issues, but then again neither do many of Israel's right-wing supporters.

To illustrate the situation that Jewish students find themselves in on some Canadian campuses, Hanley cited a survey conducted at Carleton University on the feelings of minority student groups. While Muslim and aboriginal students felt uncomfortable in Canadian society, Jewish students felt more comfortable off rather than on campus.

Ironically, it was an anti-Israel professor from Jordan who was teaching at the University of Calgary who put Hanley on the course of redemption, so to speak. "I was assigned to write a paper on [former Israeli prime minister] Ariel Sharon," he recalled. "I went to the Internet to Arab and left-wing sources, and painted a portrait of 'Sharon the Butcher,' who was responsible for the murder of hundreds of Palestinian women and children at the Sabra and Shatilla refugee camp in Lebanon [during the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982].

"It's funny," he adds, "that no one ever blamed the Christians who actually fired the bullets."

So Hanley submitted his paper and, to his great surprise, the professor told him to redo it basing his work on "reasonable sources."

"I went to a library and picked up a biography of Sharon," he said. "It was the first time that I was exposed to a Jewish/Zionist narrative. It turns out that there were atrocities on both sides and that the Arab States started some of the wars."

"I began to moderate my views."

His views were further moderated by another class in which he was enrolled, one taught by an Israeli professor that encouraged dialogue between Jews and Arabs.

"It's all about the narrative," Hanley said in suggesting how Jewish students can combat anti-Israel sentiment on campus. "The anti-Israel/Palestinian narrative is that Israelis are nameless, faceless, brutal thugs who prey on Palestinians' children. We need to tell our story about the historic Jewish connection to the land, Israeli technological achievement, Israel's buoyant economy and thriving culture."

Another piece of the answer is to educate Canadians as to how small Israel is, Hanley said. Many Canadians have no idea how small Israel is.

He also cited a survey that found that many Canadians don't know that Israel is a Jewish state.

Antisemitism has always been couched in terms of the highest ideals of the times. In our times, those ideals are for human rights and against colonialism and racism. Israel, especially since the UN World Conference against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in September 2001, is smeared as a colonial, apartheid and racist state and a regular violator of human rights.

Those anti-Israel activists on the left aren't conscious of the fact that they hold Israel to the same double standard that have always applied to Jews, he said.

When advocating for Israel, Hanley said, you have to tailor your approach to your audience. For example, when talking to a New Democratic Party group, focus on Israel's human rights record. A Conservative group will want to hear about Israel as a democracy.

He cautioned against getting into arguments with anti-Israel speakers in public. The speaker, he says, has the advantage. He or she has the stage and the microphone. You aren't going to change his or her views, and if you lose your cool, you play into the hands of the anti-Israel crowd.

"It is important to try to remain and appear reasonable," he said.

The most important thing students can do, he said, is educate themselves about the facts and the issues.

Hanley added that you can be both pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian.

Antisemitic events rare on campus, study shows

Sammy Hudes

Special to The CIN

OTTAWA — Few anti-Israel and anti-semitic events are taking place on the vast majority of university campuses in Canada and the United States, according to a study released last month by the American-Israeli Cooperative Enterprise (AICE).

The findings of the study, titled "Israel and the Campus: The Real Story," indicate that neither antisemitism nor anti-Israel sentiments seem to be a problem on 97 per cent of campuses in the United States and Canada.

The report's co-authors, AICE executive director Mitchell Bard and the organization's campus liaison, Jeff Dawson, tallied a total of 674 anti-Israel events on 108 campuses during the 2011-12 academic year. However, one-third of these incidents took place on just 10 campuses, according to the study.

These efforts were countered in large part by pro-Israel students working under the professional guidance of their local campus Hillels and other Jewish organizations.

The report also touched on the lack of success encountered by the campus-based anti-Israel divestment effort.

"The BDS movement has largely backfired, and ties [between Israel and North American universities] are stronger than ever and continue to grow," the authors wrote.

The results of the American study were released just a few weeks after Carleton University acknowledged that an antisemitic atmosphere is being felt by many Jewish students on its campus.

The admission came in a report by the university's Commission on Inter-Cultural, Inter-Religious and Inter-Racial Relations on Campus. The commission had circulated a campus-wide survey in 2010 that revealed "Jewish students feel that public venues on campus are not always welcoming and safe places for them, particularly if the student is easily identified as Jewish."

Carleton's report also stated that Jewish students said they've experienced "disrespect, as well as physical and verbal harassment, including antisemitic comments that often stem from anti-Israel sentiments."

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center Canada, said he was "flabbergasted" by AICE's conclusions, citing Carleton's own report and other examples of anti-Israel activity on many Canadian campuses.

"What we see is a situation on university campuses that has its ups and downs and depends on the campus," Benlolo said, adding that Carleton's report "in fact validated the fact that antisemitism does happen on campus, that students are concerned and feel intimidated."

Judy Zelikovitz

Benlolo said antisemitism on Canadian campuses is still a "widespread problem," a conclusion also held by the Canadian Parliamentary Inquiry into Anti-Semitism, which revealed its finding in July 2011 after a two-year investigation on antisemitism in Canada.

But despite instances of antisemitism on campus, the AICE study in many ways does reflect the reality at Carleton, according to Sunny Cohen, president of the Carleton branch of the citywide student-run Israel Awareness Committee (IAC).

"Obviously Carleton has had issues in the past with anti-Israel activities. However, it's usually restricted to a small number of students on campus," Cohen said. "The majority of students don't hold any kind of anti-Israel or any antisemitic biases."

While groups promoting anti-Israel sentiments generally try to keep religion separate from their cause, Cohen said, they're often unsuccessful.

"Given the fact that anti-Israel activism is generally tied into anti-Zionist activism, I think it's inevitable that you're going to have some antisemitic views or maybe actions that can be perceived as antisemitic used as part of anti-Israel tactics."

While most Jewish and pro-Israel students at Canadian universities tend to have positive experiences, there have been instances over the years in which "students have been subject to harassment or intimidation by anti-Israel activists," said Judy Zelikovitz, vice-president of university and local partner services at the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

"While being cautious not to paint too broad a picture, the trend in this regard has generally improved in recent years," Zelikovitz said via email.

However, she noted that student governments being manipulated into adopting anti-Israel resolutions is an ongoing problem.

"While there have been rare symbolic successes for anti-Israel activists, most such initiatives have been defeated," she said.

Emulating our most giving forefather

Rabbi David Appelrouth

One of the remarkable characteristics of our Jewish community is the amount of philanthropy we have. I'm aware of innumerable worthy local and international organizations that the Toronto Jewish community provides for. Our community is like the perennial "Giving Tree" that keeps on giving.

The trait of giving isn't new to our nation. In fact, our spiritual DNA is predicated on a desire to help others. While it's wonderful that Toronto emulates the trait of our ancestors, let's appreciate for a moment just how far "giving" can go.

Our forefather, Abraham, is known as the pillar of charity, the "Amud Hachessed." In this week's Torah reading, we get a sense of his wide charitable net.

The community of Sodom and Gomorrah was the antithesis of Abraham when it came to charity. Even though they lived in the most opulent place in Canaan, the Sodomites drafted legislation that forbade charity. Not only was it a crime to host a guest or feed the poor, but it was punishable by death!

Before God lays waste to Sodom, he beckons Abraham to defend it.

"Could you destroy the city if you could find 50 righteous men?" Abraham argues. It would be inappropriate, Abraham reasoned, to destroy Sodom if even a handful of righteous people resided there.

Abraham pleads until he realizes that in the absence of all righteousness, Sodom indeed deserves destruction.

In principle, how could Abraham defend Sodom? Wouldn't he loathe Sodom for its stinginess? Even if

We live in a large Jewish community. We could pick a shul or a neighbourhood with like-minded people. We could find our niche and never look beyond it. This is the most comfortable option, but it's a closed mentality.

In my few years in Toronto, in my job as a rabbi, I've learned to embrace Jews from all walks of life. I, too, must struggle with not identifying people by their dress. But by getting to know people, pushing past the externals, I learn to see the pearls of greatness that lie within Jews from across the entire spectrum.

We are a city of givers. We're a philanthropic bunch. Like our ancestor Abraham, let us learn to not just give with our wallets, but to see with our hearts.

You don't have to defend a Sodomite, and you don't have to change your bling. You just have to think outside of your box. And in doing so, you climb one rung closer to the greatness of our most charitable forefather.

Rabbi Appelrouth is educational director at the Temmy Latner Forest Hill Jewish Centre in Toronto.

Rabbinic Reflections

there were 10 righteous individuals, what about the thousands of wicked locals?

The Nitziv, in the introduction to his magnum opus the Emek Davar, answers with certainty that Abraham hated the city. He disagreed to the core with what it stood for. But Abraham differentiated the crime from the criminal. He understood that despite their wicked acts, people could still possess a vestige of goodness.

We may never attain Abraham's level of giving. But there is something we can do.

May the best person win

Once again, we're in the midst of election fever. This week's U.S. presidential vote featured two distinct visions for America, and Israel became a major issue in the campaign. Soon Israelis will also head to the polls, and with the recent announcement by Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty that he is stepping down, a provincial election may soon follow.

As I watched some of the U.S. debates, my favourite part was the "truth checker" on one of the networks, where candidate statements were checked against the actual truth. To the surprise of no one, not every claim made by those wanting to be president of the United States was actually true. While I believe that most politicians enter politics to serve the public, something about the culture of politics makes it increasingly difficult to be successful while simultaneously being dedicated to the principal that "the signature of God is truth."

To some extent – though to one much less than is the current norm – we can excuse politicians for their liberal definition of the truth when speaking. But what's inexcusable is to act against the public good for political gain. Such appears to be the case in Ontario, where the premier prorogued the legislature and thus avoided any further investigation into the cancellation of planned gas-fired power plants just before the last election. Those cancellations helped secure seats for his party, but ended up costing hundreds of millions, and possibly billions, of taxpayer dollars.

Of course there may be another explanation – the one above is

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

touted by the opposition parties, who themselves may stretch the truth – but by refusing to deal with the issue, it does give much credence to such claims. Such politically motivated decisions are, sadly, par for the course.

It's for this reason that the recent death of James Coyne garnered so much news coverage. Coyne was appointed head of the Bank of Canada in 1955 and was forced to resign in 1961 after refusing to rubber-stamp the monetary policies of then-prime minister John Diefenbaker. Coyne's principled stand helped ensure the independence of the bank. It's sad that it's often those people who don't need to be elected by the public who can display the most integrity.

A recent news article noted how when Mark Carney, the current governor of the Bank of Canada, makes a promise, markets can rely on it, something they might not be able to do when an elected official makes a similar statement.

Our political leaders should be moral leaders first and foremost, and in this instance, morality shouldn't be equated with one's religious beliefs, but rather with one's personal character. And (perhaps sadly) the correlation between the two is often quite negligible.

Whether one is pro life or pro choice, or whether one favours same-sex marriage or not, seems to me less important than whether those running for public office are people to whom truth, integrity, fairness and the ability to put the common good ahead of their own personal interest are paramount.

Let's literally hope that the best person wins.

Antisemitism not exclusive to left-wing worldview

Scholars in recent decades have tried to analyze and explain the origins of antisemitism, "the longest hatred." Yet we still have no consensus.

Did the antisemitism of the West originate with the classical Greeks and Romans who saw the Jews as misanthropic enemies of humanity? Or did it come from Christian supersessionism, the "replacement theology" that argues that Jews have been replaced by Christians as God's chosen people and are now accursed for not following God's plan for the world? As for the different forms of antisemitism in the 20th and 21st centuries, are they natural outgrowths of pre-modern antisemitism or are they radically different?

One of the most prolific and skilled of these antisemitism scholars is Hebrew University of Jerusalem professor Robert Wistrich. Much of his early writing centred on antisemitism in the contemporary Arab world. Two years ago he produced a magnum opus on the history of antisemitism, A Lethal Obsession: Antisemitism from Antiquity to Global Jihad. Now he has published a book of more than 600 pages, titled From Ambivalence to Betrayal: The Left, the Jews, and Israel.

Wistrich's latest book is based on careful, meticulous scholarship and cogent analysis. He explains the potential for tension between modern Zionism and modern left-wing thinking, both of which arose in Europe in the 19th century. Many thinkers were convinced that a "Jewish problem" existed, and that it was not clear where Jews could fit in a radically different modern world.

Zionists tended to argue that there was no hope for Jewish integration in Europe; Jewish national autonomy in the Land of Israel was the only answer. Leftists, on the other hand, who had ambivalent, or worse, attitudes to nationalism, thought that encouraging Jewish nationalism was counter-productive to the goals of socialism. Many of them believed that the radical reorganization of European society that they advocated would solve the Jewish problem once and for all.

Wistrich, of course, acknowledges that even in the 19th century some Jews (and some gentiles) successfully combined Zionism with left-wing ideology, just as some do today. But his basic premise is that today's leftist anti-Israel ideology that is so often mixed with elements of antisemitism can be at least in part traced back to the original tensions between these movements.

One of the most disturbing chapters describes in detail some of the worst types of anti-Zionism and antisemitism in the radical left in contemporary Great Britain. As Wistrich explains: "It needs to be emphasized that this kind of new antisemitism in Britain is not exactly the same kind of hatred that prevailed in Europe 70 years ago. The complex multicultural society of Great Britain will not readily beyond the academy. In the introduction he writes, "This book goes to the heart of what has become a serious mental derangement in the hope that it might help the left... to regain their sanity."

The way Wistrich presents his arguments leads the average reader who is concerned about antisemitism to conclude that the left constitutes the greatest danger. This is a common claim made by people with neo-conservative agendas. For example, in a series of tendentious articles on Jews, money and U.S. politics in the National Post this summer, Lawrence Solomon argued that Jews in the United States used to vote Democratic since they were convinced that the right was antisemitic. Now that rationale is gone since, he argues, much of contemporary antisemitism derives from the left.

But does it? The worst antisemitic episode of history, the Shoah, was perpetrated by a modern right-wing ideology, and right-wing antisemitism, especially on the radical right, is hardly a spent force. Even after reading this well-researched book I don't know whether I, as a Jew, should be more afraid of the loony left or the radical right. And while I was convinced by Wistrich that the phenomenon of leftist anti-Zionism and antisemitism is worse than I had imagined, I still don't know how much of the left is implicated. Is it five per cent, 50 per cent or 90 per cent? While I learned from this book that Holocaust denial or "Holocaust inversion" (the claim that the Jews are perpetrating a Holocaust in Palestine) exists on the left, surely the true home of Holocaust denial is on the right (as Wistrich notes in passing).

Wistrich himself documents that even within the ranks of the most strident leftists one can still find principled support for Jews and the State of Israel. He cites, among others, Jean-Paul Sartre and Simone de Beauvoir. He quotes from a recent interview with Fidel Castro who asserted that Israel had an unequivocal right to exist, adding that "I don't think anyone has been slandered more than the Jews. I would say that they have been slandered much more than the Muslims because they are blamed and slandered for everything. No one blames the Muslims for anything."

You can choose to take a leftist or a rightist worldview, but avoiding antisemitism shouldn't, on the evidence before us, be the motivating factor for your choice.

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

tolerate cries of Sieg Heil, jackboots, or the openly racist mythology that was irrevocably stained by the Holocaust... The spearhead of this [new] assault has been the 'anti-racist' left in Great Britain which now attributes to Jews and the State of Israel the worst sins of the West - racism, ethnic cleansing, 'crimes against humanity' and even genocide. This conscious attempt to 'Nazify' Judaism, Zionism and Israel deserves to be regarded as one of the most scandalous inversions in the history of the longest hatred."

Another chapter shows how, against all reason, some radical leftists have made common cause with Islamists, united by their animus to Jews and Israel despite the fact that virtually all other parts of their ideologies are incompatible.

This book will be useful for scholars of antisemitism, but it appears that Wistrich has a political motive

Cure for IBD disease closer: gastroenterologist

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Canada has one of the highest incidences of inflammatory bowel disease (IBD) in the world, afflicting an estimated 233,000 people, with 28 being diagnosed each day.

IBD, which is a range of conditions including Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis, develops when parts of the body's immune system begins attacking the gut. Symptoms can include diarrhea, cramping, weight loss, ulcers and intestinal scarring. Those who are afflicted have a lowered life expectancy, an increased risk of colon cancer and will likely require surgery at least once in their lifetime.

Though the incidence of IBD in Canada is as common as Type 1 diabetes and epilepsy, and more common than multiple sclerosis and Parkinson's disease, it remains a stigmatized disease that is relatively unknown and misunderstood. IBD costs in Canada are estimated to be $2.8 billion per year, and the quality of life of someone with IBD is low across all groups when compared to the general population.

To raise both awareness and funding, the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada (CCFC) was launched in 1974 by a group of parents whose children were suffering from IBD. Since then, the CCFC has become a world leader in IBD research funding.

On Nov. 1, to kick off Crohn's and Colitis Awareness Month, CCFC launched a report intended to raise awareness of IBD in Canada, and to lead to new research opportunities and improved quality of life for Canadians living with IBD.

At a panel discussion held at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital on Nov. 1, Mount Sinai president and CEO, Joseph Mapa, said that "digestive health is one of the key programs at Mount Sinai, and we employ some of the most talented people in the world. I am proud that the CCFC allows us to be part of the discussion and solution to IBD, so we can continue our important work."

Dr. Kevin Glasgow, CEO of the CCFC, discussed some of the findings of the report, as well as the goals of the CCFC. "In CCFC's perfect world, people would already be cured," he said. "We are getting closer, but we're not there yet. Until that day comes, we have an obligation to improve quality of life by reducing the impact of living with IBD."

Joseph Mapa

Glasgow talked about some of the challenges that a person suffering from IBD faces, including general lack of awareness of the disease, late diagnoses, poor access to IBD specialists and clinics, and lack of insurance coverage for expensive yet critical medications.

"Employment issues are very common, with 21,000 people with IBD unable to work every year, and over 40 per cent of people taking short-term leaves," he said. "Even those in remission suffer from fear and anxiety in anticipation of a future relapse."

Panelist Ruth Scully, a volunteer with CCFC, has two children with IBD. "As a mother, it is so difficult to watch my kids in pain. I wish I could take it all away from them," she said.

Her son requires more than $40,000 worth of medications per year to manage his disease. She worries that soon he will not be covered by the family insurance policy and that paying for the drugs will be a burden for him for the rest of his life.

"My strategy to cope with the IBD in my family is to do anything I can to help. I volunteer, raise money and speak to other parents whose children have been diagnosed," she said. "It's a common disease, but people aren't talking about it."

Each year, the Scully family participates in the CCFC's Gutsy Walk, to raise money for IBD research. Her children have raised more than $100,000 in pledges since they began participating. "I am more committed than ever to improving my children's future," Scully said. "We need to find a cure for IBD, but in the meantime we need to help people live with it."

Dr. Hillary Steinhart, the head of the division of gastroenterology at Mount Sinai, spoke about what it's like as a physician to see the impact of IBD. "I've been in this field for 21 years, and while treatments and surgeries have changed, the impact of IBD is still the same," he said.

"I am proud to be part of this centre of excellence, where we've been able to harness the energy and talent of some brilliant people into one place. Our clinicians see over 4,700 patients each year, many who come from outside of Toronto and Ontario to find the help they need to manage their complex disease."

Though there is still no cure, clinicians at Mount Sinai are leading cutting-edge research studies to discover the causes and treatments of IBD. "We're getting closer," Steinhart said. "With every advance in research, we are that much closer to a breakthrough."

Environmental group gets $100,000 grant

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Shores Jewish Environmental Programs has become the first Canadian organization to be accepted into the Joshua Venture Fellowship.

The fellowship supports visionary leaders and groundbreaking ideas that they believe "will impact the Jewish world and the world Jewishly."

The New York City-based Joshua Venture Group awards the fellowships every two years. Eight were awarded this year. Shores will get $80,000 in unrestricted funding and $14,000 in personalized coaching, training and networking.

Shores, which offers educational programs and grassroots initiatives rooted in Jewish social and environmental values, was selected for the grant based on its proposal to develop a rural centre for sustainable land-based Judaism at Bela Farm in Hillsburgh, Ont.

In 2009, it opened the Kavanah Garden, an organic educational garden at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

Risa Alyson Cooper, Shores's executive director, said the group was selected for the two-year grant out of 10 Canadian organizations that applied. "This acknowledgement is a vote of confidence for us. We are adding a voice to the Canadian food and farming movement."

She said that Bela Farm, which is in its early stages, is a 115-acre privately owned farm. "We would like to produce vegetables and develop value-added products such as pickles, cheese and jam. In the future, we'd like to supply kosher local organizations with ethically raised meat."

Shores also plans to offer hands-on educational opportunities such as group visits and internships.

"I am very excited about [this opportunity.] I feel like my personal and professional goals are coming together in one project."

HOOP DREAMS: Israeli basketball player Itzik Ohanon, right, plays with grades 5 and 6 boys at Joe Dwek Ohr HaEmet Sephardic School during a visit last month.

PERMANENT REDUITY

Survivor was left for dead in frozen swamp

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The C/JN

"Holocaust survivor Fay Kieffer is the most amazing woman I have ever met," said Rochelle Bowmile, the head of special education at Unionville High School.

Bowmile met Kieffer two years ago, when she came to speak at the high school. As she drove Kieffer home, Bowmile asked the then-82-year-old survivor if she would be willing to tell her the entire story of how she survived the Holocaust.

Kieffer agreed, and the two met regularly for a year, during which Bowmile wrote Kieffer's memoir. Through our meetings, we "formed a strong and fast friendship," Bowmile said.

The memoir, titled The Day That Changed My Life, will be published by the Azrieli Foundation, which supports a wide spectrum of initiatives through the Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program.

"Fay's story is much like the many amazing survival stories we have heard and read before," Bowmile told The C/JN. But "while Fay's story is one of horror, grief, pain, uncertainty and fear, it is also [one of] hope, compassion, love and optimism.

"Her story rises above hate and evil and instead [it] portrays a woman who has truly learned to face each day with faith, kindness and care."

In the memoir, Kieffer also recalls the "many souls that helped her along the way... without their help, she would surely have perished," Bowmile said.

Two years ago, when she wanted to have a Holocaust survivor speak at her school, a colleague told Bowmile that his mother-in-law had a neighbour who was a survivor and an incredible woman. The neighbour always has a smile on her face, he said, even though she is not well and has faced many tragedies in her life.

When Kieffer was approached, she agreed to talk at the school, although she said that she had never before spoken about her life during the war.

"At the school, Kieffer spoke to the grade 6, 7 and 8 students. She spoke so well, so eloquently," Bowmile said.

"Never before had I seen so many students so engrossed and engaged. By the end of her talk, there was not a dry eye in the gym."

Kieffer was born in Bieniekonie, Poland, a small town near Vilna. She had a happy childhood until the lives of her family – her grandparents, her parents Sarah and Nachim Wolpianski, her sister and her brother – were shattered in June 1941 when the Nazis came to her town. She was 13 years old at the time.

In the book's introduction, Bowmile writes, "Imagine being a 13-year-old girl whose family has been forced into an unimaginable situation, compelled to move out of their homes with hundreds of other families into the Vilna ghetto."

"Imagine watching half of these families being marched out of the ghetto only to be shot and buried in the graves that were dug just the day before. And try to imagine being 13 years old and given no choice but to leave the ghetto as a slave labourer every day to lay railway ties, wash streets, clean toilets and other unbearable jobs instead of going to school.

"And then coming home late one day to find your family has vanished, been taken away and having no idea where they are or if you will ever see them again."

In an interview, Kieffer said she was able to escape because the slave labourers were taken out of the ghetto to work every day.

"My brilliant eight-year-old brother told me to escape. And every time I was ready to give up, I heard my brother's words. He said, 'You must survive to tell the story.'"

In her memoir, Kieffer tells about the horrors of being alone, of starvation, cold, of being a fugitive and being hunted like an animal, running from one place to another and not knowing where she was, and of being raped and left for dead.

With tears in her eyes, Kieffer recalled the incident. "I must have passed out and they left me for dead. They mutilated my body, and I have suffered the rest of my life both physically and mentally."

She wandered for eight months, and miraculously, a partisan found her frozen in a swamp, where she had fallen asleep.

"My legs were frozen into my boots, which were filled with water, and my hands were frozen. When they removed my boots, the skin came off," Kieffer said.

"It was a very painful recovery, and after two months, I was able to help with others who were sick and wounded, as the Germans were bombing the area."

The day they were liberated, she had an attack of appendicitis and was operated on without an anesthetic, as there were no medical supplies, she said.

Kieffer returned to her town to discover that the Jewish homes were empty, windows were broken and the families' possessions had been stolen.

Of the 600 Jews in Bieniekonie, only 14 survived the war. She later discovered that her mother, who was searching for her, had survived in the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp in Germany.

Kieffer left Poland with a false passport under the name of a Greek girl. When she reunited with her mother in Germany, she said, "We couldn't say a word. We were paralyzed with emotion," Kieffer said.

"I came to Toronto when I was 20, when [David] Dunkelman of Tip Top Tailors came to look for people to work for his company," she said, explaining that this was a ploy by the founder of the menswear manufacturer to bring Jews to Canada.

Kieffer, who has two sons, Norman and Rudy, and two grandchildren, said, "I am grateful for surviving, for living in a free country, and hoping Canada will always be free."

"If Hitler didn't leave the survivors physically crippled, he left us mentally crippled forever."

With bright blue eyes she smiles and said, "But I count all my blessings, and when I am tormented with my memories, I get up and thank God that I am independent and grateful for what I have now."

The article "Polish films have memorialized the Holocaust" (Nov. 1), identified scholar Marek Haltof as an American, when in fact he is a Canadian.

Former Dachau inmate recalls imprisonment

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

"I was a number in Dachau," mused Erwin Schild, a retired Toronto rabbi who endured about a month of captivity in Nazi Germany's first concentration camp.

Like the more than 200,000 prisoners from more than 30 different countries who passed through this hell on earth in southern Germany from 1933 onward, Rabbi Schild was dehumanized and demonized in Dachau, which served as a prototype for other Nazi concentration camps later built in Germany and German-occupied Europe during the Holocaust.

To the Nazis, prisoners like him were merely numbers whose lives did not count. Upon arriving in Dachau, they were compelled to relinquish not only their clothing and possessions, but their names, rights, dignity and identity as well.

Last week, at an exhibition at the consulate of the Federal Republic of Germany, Rabbi Schild – the former spiritual leader of Adath Israel Congregation and a member of the Order of Canada and the Order of Merit of Germany – was given back his identity, so to speak.

The exhibit, Names Instead of Numbers: The Dachau Remembrance Book Exhibition, is part of Holocaust Education Week in Toronto.

Through the medium of photographs and text, it tells the story of 22 people, including Rabbi Schild, who were imprisoned in Dachau, a former munitions factory near Munich where some 43,000 people died, primarily from malnutrition, disease and suicide.

Running until Nov. 30 at the consulate (2 Bloor East, 25th floor), it was created in Germany in 1999 with the objective of remembering individuals rather than dry, anonymous statistics.

In the last 13 years, the biographies of more than 100 ex-Dachau prisoners have been compiled by, among others, German high school and university students.

As German consul general Sabine Sparwasser suggested in a brief speech introducing Names Instead of Numbers, it is an ongoing memorial project designed to confront Germany's Nazi past with unflinching honesty and solemnity.

Prisoners sent to Dachau, Jews and Christians alike, hailed from all walks of life and from different nations, and were immediately subjected to inhumane treatment.

Rabbi Schild, who was born in Cologne in 1920 and immigrated to Canada after spending a year in Britain as an enemy alien, met a similar fate, as he noted in a highly personal talk.

Transported to Dachau from Wurzburg, where he had studied at a Jewish teachers seminary, he arrived in the camp after the eruption of Kristallnacht in November 1938. Describing Kristallnacht as "an orgy of destruction" and a "dress rehearsal for the Holocaust," Rabbi Schild said the nation-wide pogrom was "a premeditated plan" by the Nazi regime to show Jews they had no place in Germany.

As frenzied mobs attacked his seminary, he could hear the jubilant roar of ruffians, their heavy steps and the crash of glass. "I thought my life was over," he recalled.

At Dachau, "unimaginable cruelty" and deliberate pain were inflicted on him. "I lived under constant terror, and was stripped of my individuality and humanity."

Forced to wear a pajama-like uniform, he subsisted on meager rations. And although he was there only relatively briefly, it felt like 300 years.

"It was just horrible."

The low point of his incarceration came when he met his father there. Released not long afterward, his father and his wife would perish in "the darkness and pain" of the Riga ghetto, two of the six million victims of the Final Solution.

Calling Names Instead of Numbers yet another manifestation of Germany's struggle to remember and atone for the long night of the 12-year Nazi era, Rabbi Schild observed, "We can only say 'Never again.' This is the only thing we can do for the victims of the Holocaust. Never again should innocent people be persecuted and murdered for who they are."

A promoter of interfaith dialogue and Jewish-German reconciliation, he called on all of "God's people" to coexist in "peace and harmony."

The evening ended on a lyrical note when a young and upcoming German musician currently studying at the Royal Conservatory of Music, Constanze Beckmann, gave a stirring piano recital of the works of two Holocaust survivors, Gyorgy Ligeti of Hungary and Austria and Paul Ben-Haim of Germany and Israel.

Jewish partisan recalls wartime experiences

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

"My pillow was my rifle and the sky was my roof," said Faye (Faigel) Schulman, poetically recalling her two years as a Jewish partisan in eastern Poland during the depths of World War II.

Schulman, now a grandmother, became a partisan in 1942 and remained one until that area of Poland was captured by the Soviet Red Army in 1944.

"I never slept in a house for almost three years," said Schulman, a resident of Toronto since 1948.

Her role as a partisan is recounted in Vengeance, one episode of War Story, a 14-part TV series that will premiere on the History Channel on Thursday, Nov. 8 to commemorate Remembrance Week.

Vengeance, which tells the story of three other Jewish partisans aside from Schulman, will be broadcast on Sunday, Nov. 11 at 10:30 p.m.

In an interview, Schulman said she joined a partisan group after her parents, Yacov and Razel, and six of her seven siblings were murdered by the Nazis.

Schulman, who prefers to keep her age confidential, was born in Lenin, a town of about 10,000 inhabitants in what is presently Belarus.

Lenin, half of whose population was Jewish, was occupied by the Red Army in 1939. But after Germany invaded the Soviet Union in 1941, Lenin was taken over by the Wehrmacht, the German army.

The Nazi invasion had an immediate impact on Schulman. As she put it, "They came in the middle of the night and woke up my whole family, forcing us to lie on the floor and sing."

Almost immediately, Schulman began working for the Germans as a photographer, having learned the craft from her oldest brother. Her duties included developing photographs of mass Jewish graves, enlarging photographs for portraits and taking passports photos, for which she was compensated with scraps of food.

Once, she was threatened with death if she did not finish a job within an hour. "I then realized what we faced," she said.

In 1942, the Nazis liquidated the ghetto and killed the Jews of Lenin in a series of mass shootings, burying the corpses in trenches. She and a handful of Jews were spared because they were considered essential workers.

One of her brothers, studying at a yeshiva elsewhere, survived. An Orthodox rabbi, he lives in New York City today.

Shortly after Lenin's Jews were massacred, the town's Christians were slain, and Lenin was razed.

Partisans attacked Lenin, and Schulman joined the Molotava Brigade, consisting of several thousand Red Army soldiers who had escaped from captivity.

"I left Lenin with the Russians," she said. "The partisans accepted me right away."

The commanders of the brigade knew that Schulman, who went by the name of Fania, was Jewish. The fighters, however, were not privy to that knowledge. "It was easier to survive," she said.

One of 20,000 to 30,000 Jews who drifted into partisan formations in Europe, Schulman worked mainly as a field nurse, having been trained by the brigade doctor, a veterinarian by profession.

Partisans, backed materially by the Soviet Union, engaged in guerrilla warfare and sabotage against the Germans and their local collaborators.

Schulman, though not a combatant, accompanied fighters to the front lines and treated the wounded. "I saved many lives," she said.

For about a year, she protected an eight-year-old Jewish girl whose parents had been killed. She was airlifted to the Soviet Union, and Schulman never heard from her again.

Schulman and her fellow partisans lived deep in a dense forest, in shelters made of logs and branches. Life was hard and rough, and although starvation always loomed, they never went hungry. Food, medical supplies and ammunition were obtained in raids on local villages and Nazi encampments.

Surprisingly enough, these conditions did not affect her health. "I never had a cold, but today I suffer from arthritis."

Schulman's brigade liberated the city of Pinsk in the summer of 1944, by which time the Wehrmacht was in retreat.

After the liberation, she worked as a newspaper photographer in Belarus.

Faye (Faigel) Schulman, front right, during her days as a partisan

She met her husband-to-be, Morris Schulman, a former partisan commander, during this period. Soon, they found themselves in a displaced persons camp in Landsberg, Germany, where Adolf Hitler was imprisoned after participating in a failed coup and where he wrote his political manifesto, Mein Kampf.

Schulman spent three years in the DP camp, giving birth to her first child, Susan, now a psychiatrist, and smuggling rifles to the newly formed state of Israel.

She and her family immigrated to Canada in 1948, living in a windowless attic for a while. She had a second child, Sidney, now a surgeon, in 1952.

Like many Holocaust survivors, the past is a source of anguish for Schulman. Several years ago, she unburdened herself by writing a book, A Partisan's Memoir, published in 1995.

Yet bitter memories of her parents' and siblings' deaths remain deeply embedded in her heart and soul.

"How can I not think about it? I cry every day. I can't forget. It's on my mind."

Holocaust stories must be preserved: Lessing

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Only time will tell whether efforts to compensate Austrian Holocaust survivors and their heirs have been successful, said Hannah Lessing, secretary general of an Austrian government organization dedicated to compensating survivors.

Hannah Lessing

Lessing spoke to two audiences last week, both Holocaust Education Week events, to share stories and challenges she has encountered in her work at the National Fund of the Republic of Austria for Victims of National Socialism, as well as the General Settlement Fund for Victims of National Socialism.

The funds together try to compensate Holocaust survivors and their descendants for their suffering and loss.

"Most of the people come to our offices and say, 'I have an Uncle Moshe. I don't even know his family name but here are the names of my parents,'" she said, as an example.

Therefore, research is the key to this organization's success, and that often requires lots of time. "But time is something Holocaust survivors don't have," she said.

There are two funds: the national fund and the settlement fund. The former deals with direct Holocaust survivors and provides a single lump-sum payment to victims, while the latter considers damages and losses of assets, and compensates heirs of the original victims.

In June, the claims committee for the settlement fund decided on the last of the applications, and today, the majority of the money has been distributed – $209 million (Cdn) to 20,500 beneficiaries, Lessing said. Additionally, the national fund equally divided up funds to 20,400 survivors.

Despite the apparent success of the programs, Lessing said that Holocaust remembrance must go beyond monetary restitution.

"Dealing respectfully with the past is not only a question of payments. Coming to terms with the past demands both material restitution and symbolic recognition. And each new generation must learn the lessons of the past for itself," Lessing said.

She said the organizations, having fulfilled much of their mission of compensating survivors and descendants monetarily, still have to educate the country about the Holocaust through academic research and through preserving the memories of the victims.

"Our legacy is to collect the life stories, and we are now starting a collection of books, which is partly German, partly English, that will be distributed to all schools and libraries in Austria," Lessing said. Additionally, many of the stories have been published online.

The key to teaching young generations about the Holocaust is helping them relate to the victims. For example, Lessing suggested reminding Muslim students about the Islamophobia that erupted in the United States and in Europe following the Sept. 11 attacks. That parallel would give some students an idea of what the Jews faced in terms of persecution during the Nazi era.

A major problem with education is that the Austrian government, Lessing said, has no funding earmarked for Holocaust education.

"It's difficult to explain why, after 70 years, we're still talking about the Holocaust," she said. Therefore, many Holocaust-related organizations are slated to close within the decade.

However, Lessing said it's her goal to keep the national fund going. She will argue that the organization must continue as long as there is at least one Austrian Holocaust survivor alive – but afterward, it's going to be difficult.

Events like Holocaust Education Week allow the victims of the Holocaust to be remembered in a very personal and dignified way, Lessing said, adding that European countries must learn from this approach.

"It shows that memory is a powerful force which can safeguard the legacies of a broken past," she said.

Lung transplant recipient breathes freely again

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jay Sokoloff is short and wiry, and when he walks and talks, all 120 pounds of him walks and talks quickly, with new purpose and vigour.

His vigour can be attributed to his new set of lungs.

After suffering from cystic fibrosis (CF) his entire life, 41-year-old Sokoloff woke up on June 24 in his Notre Dame Hospital room and marked the Fête nationale holiday with his new set of bellows pumping fresh, unfettered air into him.

Sokoloff said that from the very moment he came to after 10 hours of dual-lung-transplant surgery four months ago, he realized that the years of gasping for breath on stairs and hills, of coughing, and of mucous-choked lung infections, had come to an end.

"It was like a breath I hadn't had since I was 14 or 15 years old," Sokoloff said in a recent interview. "It was an excitement I couldn't come down from."

Through overtures made by friends, Sokoloff even received refuah shleimahs from former U.S. president George W. Bush, Prime Minister Stephen Harper, sports-writer Frank Deford and a longtime sports broadcasting hero of Sokoloff's, Bob Costas.

"I could not believe that we were actually emailing each," said Sokoloff.

Sokoloff took the surgery in stride, as he did his CF during the decades leading up to the operation. He lived as normal a life as possible with a genetic disorder that triggers lung infections, scars the pancreas and claims many by their late teens. Diagnosed at age three, he grew up with three older siblings, attended Jewish day school, and competed in sports and outdoor activities without any real problems until puberty, when CF symptoms began to make their presence more known.

But regular life still continued. In 2001, Sokoloff married his wife, Virginia, and they had two daughters, Sarah, now 8, and Nora, 7. Sokoloff also established a flourishing gift store — Mortimer Snodgrass — in the west end before relocating to Old Montreal.

But in August 2010, because his CF was steadily getting worse and at the advice of his doctors, Sokoloff applied to be put onto a double-lung-transplant wait list in Quebec.

Equipped with a beeper and told never to be more than an hour's drive from the city, Sokoloff and his family waited and waited while carrying on with their normal routine. On the eve of the surgery, Sokoloff was still walking the family's two dogs — Lucy and Mortimer — around the block.

On June 24, his daughter Sarah had just been dropped off for summer camp and family friends were visiting in the backyard when Sokoloff's beeper suddenly went off.

"You wait and you wait, but it was still a shock," Sokoloff said. "I knew it meant lungs were available." He had been number 12 on the list, and the transplant team had to make sure the lungs were compatible and would fit Sokoloff's relatively slight frame.

A few hours later, he was on the operating table.

"All I took was my slippers," Sokoloff said. "There was anticipation and a little anxiety, but I was calm."

Sokoloff spent only 19 days in the hospital. Life now, he said, has become a daily regimen of dozens of anti-rejection pills and medication to help his CF-damaged digestive system, as well as blood tests, not to mention a suppressed immune system that only days before speaking to The C/N landed him in the hospital with pneumonia.

"That was the first 'hiccup' I had," Sokoloff said. One doctor told him that in a way, he was "trading one disease for another" because of the new risks and regimen.

But if that's the case, being able to breathe freely again despite the rejection issues is a "disease" he has no problem dealing with. At the beginning of September, his store held a huge sale to celebrate the transplant, and Sokoloff is champing at the bit to return to work full time.

He is also planning to take his family to Colorado on a ski trip next February, even though he would not be covered by Medicare, U.S. government health insurance, if transplant-related issues surfaced there.

"I'm willing to take that gamble," Sokoloff said.

Reform shul gets new rabbi

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Rabbi Lisa Grushcow was formally installed as senior rabbi of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom at Shabbat services on Oct. 19.

She's the first woman to hold that title in the Reform congregation's 130-year history, as well as the first woman to lead a Canadian shul with more than 1,000 member families.

The ceremony drew a full house, including representatives from across the Jewish religious spectrum, as well as community, political, academic and cultural leaders, and Christian clergy.

In addition to family and friends from Rabbi Grushcow's hometown of Toronto, a large contingent of her former congregants from Congregation Rodeph Sholom in Manhattan chartered a bus to Montreal to be part of the weekend-long celebrations.

Temple president Stephen Yaffe and search committee chair Victor Goldbloom, among others, spoke of Rabbi Grushcow's warmth, intellect, and the impact she has already made both at the temple and in the community since her arrival in July.

The installation was performed by Rabbi Robert Levine, senior rabbi of Rodeph Sholom, where Rabbi Grushcow was an associate rabbi for nine years.

Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom's rabbi emeritus,

Rabbi Leigh Lerner who retired as senior rabbi in June after 23 years, also participated in the ceremony.

Rabbi Grushcow responded by thanking congregants "with whom I have travelled to this point, with whom I have shared so much. I want to express my gratitude to the congregants who brought me here, to this sacred congregation, the oldest liberal synagogue in Canada."

The evening's service included musical performances by the temple's cantorial soloist and musical director Rachelle Shubert and the HaNeshama Choir, accompanied by Lucie Bouchard on flute, Rona Nadler on piano and Olga Gross on harp.

The celebration continued on Saturday morning. After Rabbi Grushcow's weekly Torah study session, Paul Leszner, president of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, joined her for a discussion about the movement today. The weekend's festivities concluded on Sunday with a family outing to the Ecomuseum zoo in Ste.

Anne de Bellevue.

Rabbi Grushcow, 40, is a former Rhodes Scholar who earned a master's and doctoral degrees in philosophy at Oxford University. She was ordained in 2003 at the Hebrew Union College Jewish Institute of Religion in New York.

Rabbi Grushcow has come to the temple with her spouse, Rabbi Andrea Myers, and their daughters Arielle, 8, and Alice, 2.

SACH cardiologist addresses fundraiser

Decision on saving children not based on political ideology

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Dr. Livia Kapusta, a senior pediatric cardiologist with Save a Child's Heart (SACH), which save the lives of critically ill children, recently spoke at a Jewish Federation of Ottawa (JFO) fundraiser.

Dr. Livia Kapusta
[Howard Sandler Photography]

Kapusta, the keynote speaker at the sixth annual Choices dinner, organized by the Women's Campaign of the JFO, recalled the many choices she has made in her life.

Born in Israel, where she graduated from Tel Aviv University's Sackler School of Medicine, Kapusta furthered her medical career and specialization in pediatric cardiology in the Netherlands.

"I met a nice Jewish Dutch guy... and I decided to follow my heart and went to the Netherlands," she said. "My second choice, to combine motherhood with a profession. Only two women were practising pediatricians in the hospital, and both were unmarried and without children."

Kapusta made another life-altering choice when she and her husband met representatives from Save a Child's Heart (SACH) at a dinner party. "My husband and I made a choice to join the organization," she said.

After several years of working with children from around the world who are brought to Israel for lifesaving cardiac surgery, Kapusta decided, in 2010, to return to her country of birth. "I followed my heart when my family made aliyah," she said. "I chose to work full time at the Wolfson Medical Center [in Holon, Israel] where SACH is based."

The SACH team performs lifesaving cardiac operations mainly in Israel, but also in various other countries where they are needed. The SACH team takes along its own equipment and portable machines. SACH also offers medical training programs "to build a new generation of doctors and nurses," said Kapusta. "We have 73 people coming [to train in Israel] from China, Tanzania, the Palestinian Authority, all working together to save children's lives."

Following Kapusta's lecture, she was interviewed by Canadian Press reporter Stephanie Levitz. Asked by Levitz if she would find it difficult to choose which child to operate on, in the case of a choice of a Jewish child or a Palestinian child, Kapusta replied that it is not an "either, or" situation, that children are chosen based on a variety of medical criteria and not on political terms.

"We have operated on more than 3,000 children — half of them from the Palestinian Authority, but also from China, Zanzibar and other countries... if we think they can be operated on, we do it."

The Choices event, chaired for the third year in a row by Sandra Zagon, was held at Congregation Agudath Israel on Oct. 24. In order to attend Choices, women had to make a minimum donation of $150 to the annual JFO campaign. This year's dinner attracted nearly 300 women, many of whom were attending for the first time.

Dozens of communities besieged by the storm

Ben Harris

NEW YORK — When Rabbi Avremel Okonov arrived on the morning of Oct. 29 at the school he co-founded 10 years ago in the Brighton Beach section of Brooklyn, the water in the basement had already receded from the high water mark. It only came up to his knees.

Everywhere he looked around his school, Mazel Academy, there was destruction. On the walls of the school's lower level, which sits several feet below the street and just blocks from the Brooklyn waterfront, he could see the mark where the water level had risen. It was at head level.

Four pumps had run for several hours to rid Mazel Academy of water. On Oct. 31, as the cleanup effort began to make headway, several puddles of water remained and the stench of seawater was inescapable. Hundreds of waterlogged prayer books were laid out on tables in the vestibule and piles of black trash bags lined the sidewalk filled with papers, books and other supplies destroyed by the surge of Hurricane Sandy.

But it was in the main sanctuary of an old synagogue now used by the school that the most poignant image was on display. Six Torah scrolls, stored during the storm in a safe on the lower level, were fully unrolled to dry, their parchment blotched and black lettering distorted by the floodwaters.

"We're drying them out," said Rabbi Okonov, the school's executive director. "But I'm looking closely — a lot of these pages, it's not repairable. This is just heart-breaking to look at."

Across southern Brooklyn on Oct. 31, residents took stock of the devastation wrought by the most destructive natural disaster in memory to hit New York. Downed trees blocked countless roads, and the sound of generators powering pumps could be heard on virtually every block in Brighton Beach as residents laboured to dry out their basements.

Without electricity to power signal lights, traffic was perpetually snarled. And with temperatures predicted to drop with the sun, residents were bracing for another cold night without heat.

In the nearby Brooklyn neighbourhood of Manhattan Beach, where the storm had left streets covered with sand and thick black muck, a lone worker shovelled water and debris from the entryway of Temple Beth-El. The cost of post-storm reconstruction in the region will take weeks to assess, but estimates suggest that the costs for the New York area will be in the tens of billions of dollars.

"We still didn't get through to our [insurance) broker," Rabbi Okonov said. "Our insurance papers are underwater. We have a lot of work ahead of us."

The storm known as Sandy took dead aim on Oct. 29 at some of the most populous regions of the country, home to tens of millions of people as well as the nation's largest Jewish communities. As the floodwaters rose from the Atlantic Ocean and Long Island Sound, dozens of Jewish communities were besieged.

With electricity and phone service still spotty in affected areas as the week wore on, it was difficult to fully gauge the storm's impact on local Jewish communities. Calls to Jewish agencies across the northeast only occasionally went through — and even then, more often than not, were answered only by voicemail.

Jewish Federations of North America, which later this month is expected to host more than 3,000 people in Baltimore for its annual General Assembly, was shuttered, its headquarters in the flood zone in lower Manhattan. The umbrella group's president, Jerry Silverman, was stuck overseas, unable to get a flight back to the New York area, and early in the week even emails to federation officials were coming back undeliverable.

Over in New Jersey, where the worst of the storm's impact was felt, some local federations were silent, too.

"We haven't been able to get through to a couple" of local federations, said Steven Woolf, who is helping co-ordinate the response for the Jewish Federations of North America.

On Oct. 30, many Jewish organizations began responding in earnest. Several of the largest — including Jewish Federations of North America, the Union for Reform Judaism, the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and B'nai B'rith International — set up funds to help the victims. Others helped organize volunteers to aid in the relief effort.

But little could be done, at least in the short term, to alleviate the human loss and suffering caused by the storm.

"Lots and lots of seniors who didn't evacuate are stuck in the dark, with no refrigeration, no elevators, and no stores open anywhere within walking distance," Lenny Gusel, a Russian Jewish activist who had visited Brighton Beach, wrote in an email on the morning of Oct. 31. Gusel urged his fellow Russian Jews to come help, noting that some elderly residents couldn't easily leave their buildings without elevator service. (On Oct. 31 in the evening, Con Edison, the local power company, announced that it had restored power to the Brighton Beach area, though it noted that some buildings may still be without electricity due to flooding or storm damage.)

At Mazel Academy, Rabbi Okonov tried to put on a brave face, but the hurt was palpable. He helped start the academy 10 years ago with three students. Today, he has 140, drawn mostly from the ranks of secular Russian Jews that settled in Brighton Beach and surrounding areas. With the school growing rapidly, he had renovated the school's ground floor just last year.

Now, everything they had built was ruined.

"Everything is brand new," Rabbi Okonov said, gesturing toward the recently laid floors and new furniture, all of it waterlogged and beyond repair. "Here we go again."

In related news, Israeli President Shimon Peres wrote to President Barack Obama expressing sympathy and friendship on behalf of the people of Israel in the wake of Hurricane Sandy.

In a letter sent to Obama Nov. 1, Peres wrote that he is "joined by the people of Israel in an expression of concern for the ravages caused by hurricane Sandy and the destruction it left in its wake. Our hearts go out to the people of America and I would like to extend my deepest sympathy and condolences to the families who have lost their loved ones in this superstorm."

"I am sure that as in previous occasions when the people of America had to face challenges posed by nature or man, this time, too, you will prevail," Peres wrote.

Peres concluded: "We are looking with admiration upon the courage of the American people and its leaders in dealing with the present ordeal. Our hearts are with you."

Cardboard wheelchair to roll from Israel

Viva Sarah Press
Israel21c.org

Israeli entrepreneur Nimrod Elmish is positive that the idea for a wheelchair made out of cardboard has crossed many people's minds. But it took an Israeli team to make it a reality.

"Welcome to the startup nation," says Elmish, an expert in leading early-stage startups to maturity. "We have seen you can build agriculture in the middle of the desert. We recognize a major problem in the world and we find the best solutions. We can always find a solution – you just need persistence and patience."

With great feedback and global interest in their first venture – recyclable cardboard bicycles – Elmish and automation expert Izhar Gafni of I.G. Cardboard Technologies have quietly added the cardboard wheelchair project to their operation. It's made of less than $10 worth of durable recycled cardboard, plastic bottles and recycled tires.

"Anything that you make out of wood, plastic or metal can be made out of our material," Elmish tells ISRAEL21c. "Cardboard bikes, wagons, wheelchairs, chairs for airplanes or trains, toys, even cars. We're not building cars yet. But I say, 'yet.' We believe that nothing is impossible and anything is possible."

An international non-profit organization dedicated to providing free wheelchairs for the disabled in developing nations heard about the cardboard bicycles and got in touch with ERB, the parent company of I.G. Cardboard Technologies.

Since 2001, the organization – which requested anonymity – has bought 120,000 metal wheelchairs from Chinese manufacturers every year to ship to Africa, at an annual cost of more than $6 million.

The world's first wheelchair made out of cardboard could be a game-changer for thousands of people with disabilities. (Illustration of wheelchair uses Shutterstock.com images)

"It will cost him a one-time fee of $6 million to build a factory for the production of cardboard wheelchairs in Africa and then almost nothing to produce them," says Elmish, CEO of I.G. Cardboard Technologies.

"He can produce as many wheelchairs as he wants once the factory is running. All we need is access to old car tires, plastic bottle recycling and cardboard recycling."

The maintenance-free cardboard wheelchair, weighing eight or nine kilograms (less than 20 pounds), can withstand water and humidity, and can carry riders weighing up to 400 pounds. It is even cheaper and simpler to create than the cardboard bicycle.

Elmish says the chairs would be made on largely automated production lines supplemented by a workforce comprising people with disabilities.

"The feedback is amazing," says Elmish. "A year and a half ago, the most common reaction we got was that no one would even think of buying our product and that the markets would reject it. Now that's the least of our problems. Everyone wants a part of this."

The party has a clear antisemitic streak

The museum also has set up a traveling exhibition, works extensively with Greek schools to aid in teaching about the Holocaust and, together with the Israeli Embassy in Athens, sent 24 Greek teachers to the International School for Holocaust Studies at the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial and museum in Jerusalem.

"It certainly is a very strong weapon against misinformation, bigotry and prejudice," Battinou said. "But the biggest benefit is, and should be, to teach young people to think for themselves."

While Golden Dawn mostly has targeted those it holds responsible for Greece's dire economic plight and its international humiliation – immigrants from Asia and Africa, politicians and the Communist opposition – the party also has a clear antisemitic streak.

Golden Dawn's leader, Nikolaos Michaloliakos, denies there were gas chambers or ovens at Nazi death camps and has a penchant for giving the Nazi salute. Statements from the party refer to Israel as a "Zionist terror state." Party spokesperson Ilias Kasidiaris, who made international headlines when he punched a female Communist party member in the face during a live television debate, recently read out a passage from the anti-Semitic forgery The Protocols of the Elders of Zion in parliament.

"We must react to everything they do against the Jews," David Saltiel, president of the Central Board of Jewish Communities in Greece, told JTA. "We protest, we fight in every instance where there are displays of antisemitism and will not let ourselves fall down. We take every measure we can within the spirit of democracy."

The Greek Jewish community is also trying to maintain a dialogue with the government and mainstream political parties and urging them to take a stronger stand, according to Saltiel.

Outside Jewish groups are stepping in, too. In response to the rise of Golden Dawn, the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, which assists Greece's 500 Holocaust survivors, has begun funding the Greek Jewish museum's travelling exhibition on antisemitism.

"For survivors that went through what these people went through during the war, many of whom were saved by the underground efforts of other Greeks, they never expected that in their lifetime they would see Greek support for a Nazi-like party," said the Claims Conference's chairman, Julius Berman. "There must be complete horror."

Golden Dawn's political ascendance has been fast and furious, propelled by a Greek public weary of five years of economic depression, massive unemployment and what they see as Greece's international humiliation and its betrayal by the politicians who got them into this mess. Similar factors led to Hitler's rise in Weimar Germany, some have noted.

For years, Golden Dawn had lingered as a tiny party on the fringes of society. In the 2009 elections, the party won just 0.29 per cent of the vote. But in elections in May and a do-over in June, the party captured just under seven per cent of the vote. Its popularity has been growing ever since.

Given the relatively small size of the country's Jewish community, Jewish leaders are aware that their efforts may appear like a drop in an ocean of hate, and that they alone cannot fight Golden Dawn's rise.

"It is not possible for only a few thousand remaining Jews. There must be mainstream involvement or a big segment of the mainstream like newspapers, universities and the politicians," said Hagen Fleischer, the emeritus professor of history at the University of Athens and an expert on the Holocaust and the German occupation of Greece.

The Austrian-born Fleischer, who is not Jewish, organized a public event aimed at countering the growth of Golden Dawn, bringing Holocaust survivors to tell their stories. But, he says, "You cannot solve the problem of Golden Dawn only with enlightenment or telling people there really was a Holocaust."

Initially, many Greeks and leading politicians downplayed the party's rise, dismissing it as a knee-jerk reaction from Greeks looking for a shortcut out of the country's economic crisis but who did not really identify with Golden Dawn's fascist ideology.

As Golden Dawn has become more brazen, violently attacking migrants, gays and Communists, disrupting theatre productions deemed blasphemous and holding racist events such as setting up a blood bank for "pure" Greek blood only, Greek political leaders have begun to mount a stronger response.

In October, parliament voted to lift the immunity of three Golden Dawn members of parliament accused of attacking immigrants. Public Order Minister Nikos Dendias announced the creation of a special police unit to deal with racist violence – a welcome move after repeated allegations that police were deliberately turning a blind eye to, or sometimes even colluding with, the black-shirted gangs in their attacks on foreigners.

Perhaps most significantly, the head of the Church of Greece, Archbishop Ieronymos II, spoke out. "The church loves all people, including those who are black, white or non-Christians," he said.

Saltiel says these developments give him a glimmer of hope.

"If all the political groups, the church, the universities and the media come together to try and put things in the right way, I think that this will change," he said.

Either way, the Jewish community will keep up its efforts.

"I frankly don't know if it is enough, but it is something," Battinou said. "And several small sources of something will hopefully amount to something far-reaching in this dark tunnel of racism and antisemitism."

Christians threatened

Several Christian-Arab youths are being targeted and slandered by Arab media and leadership for taking part in an Israeli Defence Forces (IDF) conference. Last month, more than 120 Arab Christian high school students in the Nazareth area came together for an event sponsored by the Defence Ministry's youth and community department on IDF enlistment and national service. The Christian Arab youths who participated in the event were depicted as traitors, and journalists wrote articles promising to "take care of them" and hunt them down, Israel Hayom reported. One writer said, "We will uproot you from the source. The mission that failed 50 years ago will fail now, too." One of the local Christian Orthodox priests, Jobrail Nadaf, who participated in the event and supports enlistment of Arab Christian teens, had been suspended from his duties as priest and excommunicated from his church by a local council. Nadaf also asked for protection by the local police after several threats were made against him. According to Israel Hayom, each year more than 50 Arab-Israeli Christians enlist in the IDF.

Abbas recants 'right of return' comments

Times of Israel Staff and Raphael Ahren
Times of Israel

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas clarified in an Egyptian TV interview that he had not intended to undermine the traditional Palestinian demand for a "right of return" for millions of Palestinians to Israel, when he made seemingly moderate comments on the subject in an Israeli TV interview Nov. 1.

That was "a personal position," he said, when asked by his interviewer on Egypt's Al-Hayat TV station late Nov. 3 about his declaration that he would like to visit his birthplace in Safed, but did believe he had the right to live there permanently.

"It's my right to see it, but not to live there," Abbas said of the northern Israeli city on Israel's Channel 2 on the evening of Nov. 1, adding that "Palestine now for me is the '67 borders, with East Jerusalem as its capital. This is now and forever... This is Palestine for me. I am [a] refugee, but I am living in Ramallah... I believe that [the] West Bank and Gaza is Palestine," said Abbas, "and the other parts [are] Israel."

Those comments were praised as "brave," by Israel's President Shimon Peres, and dismissed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman as deceptive and empty rhetoric. Among Palestinians, they were attacked by Hamas as a betrayal of the Palestinian cause. Several thousand people attended a Hamas-organized demonstration against Abbas in Gaza on the evening of Nov. 3.

Clarifying his stance in the Al Hayat interview, Abbas said, "Talking about Safed is a personal position and does not mean giving up the right of return." Indeed, he went on, "No one can give up the right of return as all international texts and Arab and Islamic decisions refer to a just and agreed-upon solution to the refugee issue, according to UN Resolution 194, with the term 'agreed upon' meaning agreement with the Israeli side."

"I do not change my position," Abbas stressed. "What I say to the Palestinians is no different from what I say to the Israelis or the Americans or anyone."

The refugee issue, he went on, was a core issue for resolution in final status talks, "based on UN Resolution 194," and "will be subjected to a popular referendum and people will either accept it or reject it."

Palestinians and their descendants who used to live in what is today Israel has been a key obstacle in peace talks. An influx on that scale would radically shift Israel's demographic balance, so that it would no longer be a Jewish state — a process no foreseeable Israeli government would sanction. Israel has said the Palestinians must permanently house their refugees in a Palestinian state whose modalities must be negotiated with Israel, just as Israel absorbed Jewish refugees from North Africa and the Middle East.

In the Nov. 1 interview, whose moderate content contrasted deeply with the bitterly hostile speech he delivered to the United Nations General Assembly a month ago, Abbas also urged Netanyahu to return to the negotiating table. His only condition was that Netanyahu declare his agreement to a two-state solution based on the 1967 lines, he said.

Netanyahu responded Nov. 4 that his offer to Abbas, for a renewal of peace talks without preconditions, remained open.

Nimer Hammad, a political adviser to Abbas, had said on Nov. 3 that "the president never mentioned the word giving up the 'right of return.'"

Rather, Hammad said, Abbas was being "realistic," noting, "He knows he can't bring back 5 1/2 million Palestinian refugees to Israel."

Microsoft Corp., Israel agree to strategic cooperation

JIA

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Microsoft Corporation have agreed to a strategic co-operation to advance computing technology.

Microsoft CEO Steve Balmer met on Monday in Israel with government officials to discuss the co-operation.

A series of memorandums of understanding will be signed in the coming days by Israel's chief information officer Carmela Avner and Microsoft Israel CEO Danny Yamin, according to reports.

The agreements to be enshrined in the memorandums are in the areas of technological innovation; promoting open government policies; use of technology to reduce bureaucracy; dealing with large databases; information security and privacy protection; development of online government services; collaborative projects; and promoting Israeli technologies and start-ups, according to the Marker, the business publication of Ha'aretz.

Balmer met on Monday with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz. Netanyahu and Balmer discussed Microsoft's commitment to Israel, its investments in the local market, and the impact it is having, according to a statement from the Prime Minister's Office.

"This is my fourth visit to Israel and I am always excited and inspired by the sheer technological ingenuity of its people and entrepreneurs, a key reason why it's such an important market for Microsoft," Balmer said.

Also on Monday, Microsoft launched its Windows 8 smartphones in Israel.

IDF orphans celebrate bar and bat mitzvahs

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Coloured toffees rained down on the bar and bat mitzvah guests of honour and whoops of elation filled the Western Wall plaza as 35 IDF orphans marked their coming of age in a group ceremony in Jerusalem.

Some 100 family members and friends, as well as educators, volunteers, army brass and benefactors, took part in the festive day in late October.

The children hailed from across the country and were brought together by the fact they all lost a parent in the Israel Defence Forces. The event was organized by the IDF Widows and Orphans Organization (IDFWO), which holds a celebration in Jerusalem annually for the coming-of-age children.

The day began with a tour of Ammunition Hill, a gifts ceremony at Aish HaTorah in the Old City, dancing and singing at the Kotel (and tfilin prayers for the boys), and then a gala event with Israeli President Shimon Peres, IDF Chief of Staff Benny Gantz and other supporters at the Jerusalem Theater.

"It's definitely festive seeing young Jewish kids at the Kotel, these kids who lost a father in the IDF. It makes me feel proud," said Daniel Tuksar, director of resource development at IDFWO.

Wearing white shirts emblazoned with the numeral 13 for the boys and 12 for the girls, the kids — who also meet up during the year for summer camp in Toronto and holiday-related events in Israel — were obviously excited by the affair.

"It's just a really fun day, and we get to meet up with our friends," said Hila Levis, 12, from Rishon LeZion.

But this is a group no one wants to be a part of, unless fate decides otherwise. A sense of sorrow was also very present together with the joy.

"I'm happy to be here. I really like Jerusalem — it gives me a special feeling," said Shany Aharonov, 12, who lost her father in a Katyusha attack in 2006. "It's fun to be here with the group, but I also feel a loss."

Some of the children had already held parties for their friends.

"It's very emotional to be here with the group," said Gal Cohen of Binyamina. "I had a party with friends and family, and that was really fun. This is more of a ceremony. It's also fun, but there's also sadness."

IDF Chief Rabbi Rafi Peretz addressed the group with a congratulatory message that reiterated the army's commitment to the bereaved families.

There are more than 8,000 widows and orphans of the Israeli security forces in all sectors of Israeli life — Druze, Bedouin, Jewish, Christian and Muslim.

"Anashim achim anachnu [we are people who are kinsmen]," Rabbi Peretz said, quoting from the Bible. "This sentence is for everyone. For the Druze and the Bedouin among us. We are brothers. All of us."

Bar and bat mitzvah ceremonies in Israel are usually hosted by the father of the child. In this case, the IDFWO takes responsibility.

"This ceremony is very emotional. We feel that our husbands didn't die for nothing and that there is someone standing behind us," said Rivka Boanish, the mother of 13-year-old Oz. Her late husband, Yitzhak Boanish, was killed in a 2002 ambush in Hebron. He left behind seven children, Oz being the youngest.

"The IDFWO support really encourages us," Boanish added. "We really are one nation struggling for our existence."

The rabbi's words were poignant for the four Toronto guests as well.

"My heart breaks for the families. We know that without the IDF the Jews in Canada wouldn't be able to live as freely as they do with their heads up. We're grateful we can be here to celebrate with them," said Peter Ekstein, an IDFWO benefactor who attended the big day with his wife, Stella.

"Like Rabbi Peretz said, we have a responsibility to take care of one another. That's why we're here."

Kotel is non-denominational

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Western Wall is not Orthodox just as it is not Reform, the rabbi of the Western Wall, Shmuel Rabinowitz, said.

"The Western Wall is the place of prayer for every individual in the nation, and as such, it must carefully safeguard the individual's right to privacy and respect during the precious moments of prayer. The secret of the Western Wall is the secret of diminution, which demands that each one of us minimize the traditions in which we differ and focus on what is common and which unifies us," Rabinowitz said in a statement released Nov. 1.

The statement came in response to the arrest last month of Anat Hoffman for leading more than 200 women in the Shema prayer in the back of the women's section at the Western Wall. Jewish groups have called for a police investigation into the arrest and changes in the decision-making process on policies at the holy site to include non-Orthodox Jews.

Rabbi Rabinowitz decried the incident, saying: "The prayer of thousands of people who came to the Western Wall from afar was disturbed by illegal demonstrations, provocation, and arrests that were meant as a show for the media."

He added that "the organization of the Women of the Wall and the entire Reform movement are the only Jewish stream who received from the State of Israel its own private area for prayers at the Western Wall, at an investment of $2 million of taxpayers' money. All the other streams and sub-streams in the Jewish nation crowd together in the Western Wall Plaza in peace and brotherhood, with mutual respect, and not one of them complains 'this place is too small'."

Meanwhile, in related news, a Jewish Agency committee adopted a resolution last week calling for a "satisfactory approach" to prayer at the Western Wall.

The Reform movement has called for an Israeli police investigation into the incident in which Hoffman said she was put in shackles, dragged across a jail floor and put into a cell overnight without a blanket, being forced to use her tallit to cover herself.

In 2003, Israel's Supreme Court ruled that women cannot wear a tallit or tefillin or chant from a Torah at the Western Wall.

Landau introduces Albertans to Israeli oil prospects

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Israel is sitting on mammoth reserves of natural gas, oil and shale deposits, so where would a government minister charged with overseeing their exploitation go during a visit to Canada?

Alberta, of course – the centre of the Canadian petroleum industry.

Last week, Uzi Landau, Israel's soft-spoken minister of energy and water resources, met with Alberta Premier Alison Redford, as well as business leaders, investors and members of the province's oil and gas community during a one-day stop in the province.

The meetings were informational in nature, Landau explained during an informal press briefing in Toronto.

People in Alberta are generally not familiar with Israel's economic situation, including its tax and royalty structure, its assets in "human capital," its status as a high-tech innovator, its leading academic institutions, and its prudent banking institutions, which successfully rode out the worst of the 2008 global downturn, he said.

Of course, his Alberta audience was particularly interested in Israel's involvement in the petroleum industry, and there was plenty to tell, he continued.

One Canadian-based exploration company, Adira Energy, which is listed on the TSX Venture Exchange, is set to begin drilling offshore in 2013, he said.

According to Adira's website, the company has obtained petroleum licenses for three blocks in Israel's offshore exclusive economic zone: the Gabriella licence covering 97,000 acres, the Yitzhak licence covering 31,555 acres and the Samuel licence covering 89,205 acres.

The Gabriella block is estimated to hold 110 million barrels of oil, while Yitzhak has 79 million barrels and Samuel 66 million barrels.

In addition to the oil, the area holds vast amounts of natural gas. The U.S. Geological Survey estimates there are 122 trillion cubic feet of natural gas in the Levant basin, and Israel can claim 40 per cent.

At present, Israel imports 99 per cent of the oil it consumes, mostly from Azerbaijan, but from other sources as well.

Landau, who represents the Yisrael Beit-einu party in the Knesset, agreed the natural resource finds are "a game changer" for Israel. They mean Israel will be less dependent on outside sources for its fuel, he said.

Development of cheap energy will boost the country's economy. Israeli industries will become more competitive and energy-intensive products will become cheaper.

The environmental impact is positive, as natural gas is cleaner than other fuel sources, he continued.

Exploitation of the resource will "contribute to Israel's geopolitical situation," he said. It should boost trade with Jordan and the Palestinians, increasing contact and "leading to a routine of coexistence" and peace.

Cheap energy reduces the cost of desalinating water, producing electricity and purifying water, he added.

Landau suggested there may be other repercussions as well: it could draw Israel closer to Europe, as Israel and Cyprus are discussing the feasibility of an underwater cable to bring electricity to that Mediterranean island nation. For its part, Cyprus is considering another cable northward, meaning Israel will have one more link with Europe, Landau suggested.

In his meeting with Redford, Landau said he advocated continued development of ties between the two jurisdictions in areas of scientific and academic co-operation.

As for the involvement of Alberta's private sector, he said Israel is open to partnerships and investment.

"Government can open the door," he said. "We're not going to replace business from doing business."

PotashCorp considers increasing stake in Israeli firm

Compiled by CJN Staff

SASKATOON — Potash Corporation of Saskatchewan Inc. (PotashCorp) last week confirmed reports that it is considering increasing its ownership stake in Israel Chemicals Ltd. (ICL).

"Discussions have occurred with Israeli government officials around potential options to increase our ownership stake in Israel Chemical Ltd.

"No deal has been formulated, there is no assurance that a deal will be reached, or that parties will sign an agreement," the release states.

Israel Corp., a holding company whose assets includes ICL, confirmed Potash's interest.

"The company confirms that PotashCorp, a Canadian company, engages in discussions with various governmental authorities, and in that framework... a meeting was held with the prime minister of Israel, in connection with the examination of a possibility for a merger between ICL and Potash."

Israel Corp. stressed, "There is no certainty that a deal will be made."

In Israel, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu acknowledged he took part in talks with Bill Doyle, chief executive of PotashCorp.

Quoting bankers and analysts, The Wall Street Journal reported any deal for a significant increase in Potash's stake in ICL could face significant political obstacles in Israel: "The government would have to sign off on such a deal, given ICL's mining interests in the Dead Sea, a body of water shared between Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian West Bank."

In addition, the Israeli government could come under pressure from environmental groups to block the deal, the newspaper suggested.

ICL's mining operations, at more than five million metric tons a year, is the lowest cost potash production in the world.

"These investments are the second best potash assets in the world after our own [in Saskatchewan]," Doyle said.

ICL, which is traded on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, is valued at $15 billion. Potash Corp. currently owns a 14 per cent stake in the company; Israel Corp. owns a little over 52 per cent.

PotashCorp is the world's largest crop nutrient company whose products are used for global food production. It is the largest producer of potash and third largest producer of nitrogen and phosphate, used by farmers to increase crop yield.

A young woman's journey through 9th century Babylonia

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Rahel, a 17-year-old Jewish girl living in the ninth century in Sura, in what was then Babylonia (Bavel), is about to be happily married off to a prominent scholar. But suddenly everything changes when her father, a popular physician, becomes the enemy of a powerful antisemite Abu Said.

And so begins The Wayward Moon (Yotzeret Publishing), the debut novel by Janice Weizman, a Toronto-born writer who now lives in Israel.

When Said kills her father, Rahel, whose mother died in childbirth, is forced to make a long and perilous journey by herself to a distant relative in Tiflis, in northern Iraq.

This journey is the setting of the novel, told primarily in three parts: Slavery, Knowledge and Freedom.

The first of these three parts is the best and could have been a shorter novel in its own right.

Knowing that the open roads are not safe, especially for women, Rahel dresses as a man, and leaves her beloved hometown, a major centre of Jewish learning at the time.

But when she reaches Baghdad, her true gender becomes revealed when she is captured and sold as a slave to a wealthy silk merchant.

Thinking it best to keep her Jewish identity hidden, she takes on a Muslim name and is sent to work in the kitchen. Although it's not ideal, and a bit beneath her station as the daughter of a physician, she knows it's better than the alternative – starving in the streets. It also worries her that Islamic law permits a master to lie with his slave and her master happens to have at least two randy sons.

When things at the merchant's house turn sour, Rahel decides to don her man's outfit once more and continue on her journey.

In the Knowledge part of the book, Rahel gets diverted from her journey and ends up working in a Christian monastery somewhere north of Baghdad.

Her cover story is that she is a Christian boy, Yusef, named after the biblical story of Joseph. But, she tells the monks, when her father died, her mother married a Muslim and they converted.

Although she chooses to stay at the monastery, she feels alienated and is confused by the monks' custom of profaning the Sabbath and revering the Jewish prophets while at the same time disdaining Jews. The sermons' virulent antisemitism is also a cause for concern. She understands that the monks' show of love for her is only because they think she's Christian.

Although not without faults, Rahel is a likable enough character. She's a strong woman at a time when women were regarded as weak.

The very act of departing on this dangerous journey was a brave decision, one she was forced to make because of her circumstances.

She is also very hard-headed. Time and time again, she refuses offers of safety and security in order to complete her journey.

For instance, one time when she is sick in the monastery, a Jewish doctor treats her, and when he examines her, he discovers not only that she is female but also, after inquiry, that she is Jewish.

He offers to come back for her when she is better and take her to his town of Mosul, where he would find her a suitable groom.

Tempting as the offer is, she rejects it after some deliberation, preferring to continue on her dangerous journey to Tiflis, even though she's not even sure her relative is even alive.

But the problem with the Knowledge part of the book – even ignoring the unlikelihood of her true gender not being discovered in a monastery full of men – is that it gets weighed down by theological and philosophical discussions.

Rahel befriends a kind monk, Anton, who instructs her in the classics – Socrates and Plato – and a series of eye-rolling discussions ensues, including a lecture on Sophocles' Antigone and something called "entelechy."

Though the next section, Freedom, in which she leaves the monastery and finds work, and love, picks up a bit, the book never reaches the heights promised in the opening section.

This is a shame because there is much to praise in The Wayward Moon. Lovers of historical fiction and strong female characters will enjoy the story but might be put off by the weightiness of the middle section.

Weizman has a terrific feel for the time period, and her characters and descriptions (from what people wore and

Documentary features real-life 'Inglorious Basterds'

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Quentin Tarantino's 2009 movie, Inglorious Basterds, was a box office sensation, his highest-grossing film. Viewers were drawn to a plot in which eight Jewish American soldiers are sent behind enemy lines to kill Nazis.

Truth, however, can sometimes be more compelling than fiction.

Toward the close of World War II, the OSS – the precursor of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency – parachuted three soldiers into Austria's Alps in a near-suicidal mission to monitor rail traffic and gather intelligence in and around the Brenner Pass, the main supply route from Germany into Italy.

The team consisted of an improbable trio of two Jewish refugees and a German army deserter.

Their story is the subject of Min Sook Lee's highly interesting documentary, The Real Inglorious Bastards, which will be broadcast on the History Channel on Nov. 8 at 9 p.m.

The soldiers in question were Fred Mayer, a German Jew who had immigrated to the United States; Hans Wijnberg, a Dutch Jew whose parents were murdered during the Holocaust; and Franz Weber, an Austrian Catholic anti-Nazi who deserted from the German army on grounds of conscience.

Lee recreates their mission by means of first-person accounts, re-enactments and interviews with historians.

All three were eager to inflict as much damage as possible on Nazi Germany.

"We were dedicated to killing Nazis," says Mayer, speaking for his two comrades-in-arms. "That's what we volunteered for."

After a year of training in guerrilla warfare and parachute school, Mayer and Wijnberg were dispatched to a base in Italy, where they met Weber.

They knew that their mission, known as Operation Greenup, was dangerous and that their chances of survival were slim.

Mayer and Wijnberg not only liked Weber, they trusted him.

In terrible weather, the three men were flown to the Austrian alpine state of Tyrol, a stronghold of the Nazi movement. From there, they made their way to a remote village, where they stayed with an anti-Nazi family.

They reported on train and troop movements, and engaged in sabotage operations as well.

Mayer was captured after infiltrating a Messerschmitt aircraft factory. Interrogated and beaten, he tried to commit suicide. Thanks to the intervention of a Nazi leader, he survived the incredibly gruelling ordeal.

By all accounts, Operation Greenup was a success, shortening the war on the Austrian front and sparing the town of Innsbruck from destruction.

Two Jews and a German army deserter made a real difference.

what they ate to what they did for pleasure) are highly illustrative.

When it's at its best, The Wayward Moon reminds me of recent historical novels such as Eva Weisman's The Last Song and Roberta Rich's delightful The Midwife of Venice.

David Liss has been one of my favourite contemporary writers since I discovered his debut novel, A Conspiracy of Paper in 2000.

I was surprised that his latest book, released last year, The Twelfth Enchantment (Random House,) fell under my radar.

But after I read it, my surprise turned to disappointment.

Whether it's the early days of the London Stock Exchange, the 1722 general election in England, or even the formation of the National Bank in America, most of Liss' novels tend to be historical mysteries and thrillers set against the background of real historical events and frequently involving the Jewish "thief-taker" Benjamin Weaver.

In this book, set against the backdrop of the Luddite uprising and the Industrial Revolution, Lucy, a young woman, whose parents both died, is sent to her uncle's house to await her impending forced marriage to a dour mill owner named Olson.

But when Lord Byron, (yes, that Lord Byron) shows up outside the house vomiting pins and muttering something about "picking up the leaves," the novel takes a surreal turn into fantasy literature.

Lucy soon discovers that she has the power to learn and cast spells and, with the help of a new friend, Mary Crawford, Lucy crafts her knowledge of the occult.

We are painfully rushed toward a climax that has more spells and counter spells than a Harry Potter book.

This is a huge – and ambitious – departure for Liss, and while I might enjoy historical fiction with a supernatural touch (I highly recommend Dan Simmons' Drood), unfortunately, this isn't what I've come to expect from him and was left, ultimately, disappointed.

Musical theatre artists sing Carole King, James Taylor

Elenna Mosoff, a Toronto producer and director, has her feet in two theatrical worlds.

She is associate director of Acting Up Stage, which is known for its modern musical theatre productions, and also a founding member of the Mission Business, an experimental interactive theatre company.

In the past few months, Mosoff, 30, has been juggling work on Tapestries, for Acting Up Stage, and ZED.TO, a Mission Business production.

Tapestries, the music of Carole King and James Taylor, will be performed at Koerner Hall on Nov. 26 by musical theatre headliners such as Cynthia Dale, Josh Young and Jake Epstein.

The Machar chapter of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (CHW) Toronto has a block of Tapestries tickets. The evening is a fundraiser for CHW projects in Israel and Canada.

While preparing for Tapestries, Mosoff was also co-producing ZED.TO, a sci-fi story about a pandemic told through four theatrical experiential events.

One event took place at the end of September during Scotiabank Nuit Blanche,

Elenna Mosoff

Toronto's all-night contemporary arts festival. The pandemic story culminated this month at the Evergreen Brick Works.

Mosoff's involvement in these radically different productions has been challenging, she says, but she credits her mother – Arlene Solomon – with keeping her calm. "My mom tells me to lie down and take a break."

Mosoff became involved in theatre in elementary school. "I was a high-energy kid. My Grade 4 teacher saw theatre as a way for me to channel that energy. She introduced me to the drama club."

After graduating from the York Region's arts high school in Unionville, Mosoff studied comparative religion at the University of Toronto, where she directed several student musical productions.

She received a full scholarship for a master's degree in fine arts in directing from Ohio University. Through this program, Mosoff had the opportunity to work in New York City and London. "It was amazing to be exposed to other theatre traditions," she recalls. "I saw where experimentation in theatre was going in other places and I was able to find my own niche."

Mosoff is working closely on Tapestries with Raza Jacobs. "He's a brilliant composer and musician," she says. "He reinterprets the music, to give it a new contemporary sound."

"We get musical theatre performers to sing the music of non-musical theatre."

Mosoff's role is to co-ordinate the production. "I take the pieces and string them together to create the flow."

She also adds "dramatic thread through the music" with sound bytes. "The music is woven together through personal reflections about the songs. You'll hear actual recordings of people from different generations."

Last June, Acting Up Stage won multiple Dora Awards for the Toronto performing arts for Caroline or Change, Tony Kushner's acclaimed musical about an African-American maid working in a Jewish home in the Deep South during the '60s.

"We won for the best musical production and best male and female actors in a musical," says Mosoff. "It was really fun to sit at the awards show and win."

ZED.TO has also received accolades. "It was voted the most innovative presentation at the 2012 [Toronto] Fringe Festival, and ZED.TO's screening clinic was "written up as one of the top 10 Nuit Blanche projects," she says.

"Three thousand people went through the 'decontamination' maze we installed in a church. We worked for 24 hours straight. It was exhausting, but exhilarating."

For information about Tapestries, call 416-630-8373. To find out about the Mission Business, go to www.themission.biz or www.zed.to.

Daniel Haber doesn't need a wake-up call anymore to remind him about something he referred to as "good fortune."

Ask him to shave his head, or talk about life as a 12-year old, and then watch his response.

Eight years ago, the Toronto-born Haber was dealing with a golf-size lump on his forehead that was also dangerously close to his brain. It created enough anxiety and worries that doctors strongly recommended to his family to deal with the problem – and quickly.

Just five days after his birthday, he went through extensive surgery at the Hospital for Sick Children that not only removed the cyst and some of his skull, but titanium plates and staples were used to patch him up.

Haber talked about his scar the other day, the one that runs from ear to ear across the top of his head but is only noticeable with one of those buzz cuts that seem to be popular with some teens at the barbershop.

"It's a scary thought, but if they didn't move quickly I am convinced there could have been brain damage," said Haber in a telephone conversation from Ithaca, N.Y. where he attends prestigious Cornell University.

"I'm very lucky, and it's something I think about a great deal."

Haber was so grateful to the medical staff at SickKid's that the least he said he could do was offer to volunteer at SickKid's last summer. His preference was the same area of the hospital that helped him.

Daniel Haber

"I was told they have some kind of policy that prevents former patients from volunteering in the same area," said Haber. "So they put me in the cancer ward to support kids and try to brighten up their day. It was important to me – meant so much – because that hospital likely saved my life."

Times have changed for Haber, and now the focus is on his foot.

A soccer player, he's kicking up a storm – and in the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA).

On the 26-member Cornell roster, with players from across the United States, China and Zimbabwe, he's the only Canadian. But that's not what's stirring up all the attention – it's the fact that he's one of the top players in the NCAA.

"I love this game – all those days of playing at the club level with Spartacus and winning three consecutive Ontario championships," said Haber. "As a kid, that's where it all started and look where I am now."

He leads Cornell, nicknamed the Big Red, with 17 goals and seven assists in 14 games. Four of his goals were game winners for the 13-1 team, and he's been a huge factor in turning around a dull and sluggish Ivy League program that was 1-15 in 2008.

The Big Red has the second best record among NCAA Division I teams in the country; it's ranked number 15 in the country by the National Coaches Association of America. Earlier in the season, the coaches ranked the Big Red 10th, the team's highest position since 1995.

"I have worked very hard and dedicated myself to training," said Haber, who is now in the third year in the College of Agriculture and Life Sciences.

"I treat [soccer] as a job and know, like in anything else, I have to do well to succeed. I'm not big or physical, but play smart and take advantage of the opportunities. Right now, I'm not sure what lies ahead, but the dream is to play at the professional level."

Getting to Cornell involved a Toronto connection: Polish-born Jaro Zawislanski, now in his fourth year coaching the Big Red, a graduate of the University of Toronto and a soccer coach with great credentials.

"Jaro has pushed my work ethic, my intensity and getting to the next level," said Haber. "It's not good enough to just score, but to stay hungry, always stay focused, challenge and play smart. I am a much better player because of him."

Haber, who played for Canada at the 2009 Maccabiah Games in Israel, is also six goals shy of the Cornell single-season record for goals in a year; he leads the NCAA in points, points-per-game and goals-per-game. He has won the Ivy League Player of the Week award, but all that falls behind his plan to help Cornell make it to the NCAA's College Cup final on Dec. 9 in Hoover, Ala.

Surprisingly, Haber hasn't even as much as got a buzz from Canada's struggling national soccer team.

Jazz singer's album is a tribute to her mother

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Brigitte Zarie's newest album pays homage to her mother, who passed away in March during the recording of this record.

"[The songs] are all reflections looking back on how much influence my mother had over me," Zarie said.

One track particularly stands out to her. She was singing along with her mother, as she often did. Her mother was also a singer. "I used to watch her in awe and hope one day I could sing like her," she said. That day, "she told me, 'I don't want to hear nobody else but you.'"

So Zarie took that line and turned it into a song called Nobody Else.

She's known for her original songwriting, recording her own songs rather than creating cover versions of classic jazz tunes.

"I have a pretty snobbish approach to art," she said. "I need to write from my own experiences."

But for her mother, she made an exception, performing Johnny Cash's song Walk the Line.

"That was her favourite movie [of the same name], and she just kept always wanting us to see it again," she said.

That song in particular was her mother's favourite, so she decided to cover it, in honour to her.

Zarie is working on a new song titled Marie, her mother's name. "That's the name of the new song, in honour of her," she said. "She was a beautiful, amazing woman. She made a huge mark in my life, and every day that goes by is a day I remember her and talk about her."

Zarie, who is originally from Toronto, has lived in New York for 15 years, having originally moved there to pursue a music career. Initially, she found success singing for commercials and movies. Though she has released two albums of her own music, she continues to do commercials.

"It's more strict because you're on a timeline, and you have to sing within the 30 or 60 seconds of the commercial," she said, adding that it's different being guided to write based on a film, rather than being inspired, perhaps, by a broken heart.

Her new album, L'amour, continues her tradition of recording a couple songs in French, to honour her French Moroccan heritage. "It's my upbringing, so it's out of respect that I do French songs," she said, adding that she has a lot of French-speaking fans.

Zarie has been quite active in the social media world, using it as a way to connect to her fans. These platforms help her learn more about her fans, and thus tell her where she should be touring.

For example, she's working on

a new song that's done as a samba. She wrote it to say thanks to her many Brazilian fans, many of whom she has met through her Facebook and Twitter pages.

"I love tweeting," Zarie said. "It's nice to have this social outlet medium to let people know what's going on."

She has almost 11,000 Twitter followers, and around 13,600 on Facebook, so her short messages reach a huge number of people at once.

Lots of her messages have to do with food. In particular, she's a huge fan of chocolate.

"It's like a standing joke with my Twitter followers that anything that makes me really happy or anything that excites me, I need to have chocolate," she said. But she's very much into health as well, she added. "I only eat organic food."

Having had the experience of releasing one album, Zarie said she approached the recording of the second one feeling like a whole different artist.

While her first album was filled with big band songs, she wanted to take the second album in a different direction — one that a listener could enjoy in quieter scenes.

"It's a whole different world for me," she said. "I just felt more experienced, more aware of my art and where I wanted to go and what I didn't want to do."

Now she has grown even more, having faced the loss of her mother. The album liner notes say that her music, now and forever, will be dedicated to her mother, "who is my inspiration and will live in my heart eternally."

"I wouldn't be doing what I'm doing if it wasn't for her," Zarie said, adding that her musician father was also a major inspiration for her. But she wants to make sure her mother can watch her and feel proud of her from heaven.

"She's my guiding force for the rest of my life," Zarie said. "Everything I do will be in honour of her."

טיפה מצוננת. אני בכל זאת מהליטה להופיע לקפה השבועי שלי עם טלי. אני פותחת בשיעול ארוך וגורני טלי (מביטה בי בחשדנות): השיעול שלך לא נשמע טוב אני לא נשמע טוב? דווקא התאמתני עליו כל הלילה... זה היה נורא. וגם התעשתי, והגרון כואב לי, והאוזן. טלי: תתקני אותי אם אני טועה, אבל את לא מרגישה טוב, או משהו?

אני: מה הסגיר אותי? אבל עזבי, אני לא אדביק אותך. הנה, לא התנשקנו אפילו טלי: לא, אני לא דואגת. אני קוראת עכשיו ספר נהדר של הסופר הקנדי הזה, שמסביר שהשיבה חובית מונעת מחלות באופן טוטאלי. בכלל, ההלטה להיות רק חובית. את לא יודעת איך מאז, זה שינה לי את החיים. אני אדם חדש. אני: מאז זה שינה לך את החיים? למה מתי גמרת את הספר, אתמול? טלי: כן. מאתמול אני אדם חדש. לא תשמעי אותי מתלוננת, לא מרכלת, כלום. אני (מזוהה את הכיסא שלי, וקמה): ובכן, היה נחמד להכיר אותך, כל טוב. טלי: שבי כבר, נודניקית. רק ליתר בטחון, פעם הבאה שאת מתעשטת-שימי יד אני: טוב. את יודעת שיצא לי ליפגוש את הסופר המהולל שלך פעם, כשהייתי עיתונאית מוערכת? אפילו שוחחנו קצת. הוא נראה בן 30, או 60. משהו כזה. טלי (נירגשת): באמת? ספרי לי על מה דיברתם? הוא באמת פצצת כריזמה? אני (משחזרת): היתה פגישת עיתונאים בקשר לספר החדש שלו. כשזה נגמר, הלכתי בדיוק לשירותים, כאבה לי גם נורא האוזן. טוב, לא רלוונטי. אחר כך יצאתי החוצה והייתה רוח נוראית. מתרישת אוזניים. ומיילא האוזן שלי...

The Denting Man

One day, while in my car with my son, Noah, a man eased his way out of his parking spot and hit our car.

It was a tap, a little bruise that will cost a few hundred dollars to repair. I got out of our car in a huff but reminded myself to be gentle and speak nicely to this man. I have anger in me. I don't like it and am often ashamed when it comes out misplaced.

I showed the man the dent and suggested he give me his phone number, and I would call him with an estimate. He did so. While we talked, the Denting Man, likely in his 60s, asked me if we could keep this from his wife. He turned to me and with great sadness said, "My wife has six weeks to live."

The Denting Man explained to me she was in an advanced stage of cancer and had just returned from Princess Margaret Hospital. He was saying there was nothing more they could do for her. He was so deflated. I asked him how long they had been together. He hesitated, and then said "40 years." How must this be for him?

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosenswieg

Imagine, this man knows when his wife will leave this Earth. Life consistently teaches us that the day of our death is kept a secret from us so that we live every day to its fullest. But that was not the situation here. While the Denting Man's wife did not know the day, or minute, or the hour in which her breathing would stop, he knew "six weeks" and that's significant enough to unseat his sure footing in the unknown.

I then had images in my mind, of a man, this man, struggling to make toast in the morning, and I could see dust gathering in the corners of his living room and dirty dishes on the table. I heard hollowness in his hallways.

The television was on. He was watching it but couldn't care less about the victorious football team on the screen. He wanted his wife back, and all the triumphs in the world wouldn't make him the victor.

All the Denting Man wanted was his wife. Monday Night Football was not produced for him. While we talked, I understood the Denting Man was a living man who was dying ever so slightly with his wife. Passersby wouldn't have known that. Bus drivers peering down at him could not have sensed his tragedy, and store owners waiting for his $1.50 to pay for the local newspaper just had no idea.

I will tell my son this, one day, I'll tell him that he should always consider that the person sitting across from him may have just failed at something or lost someone. I'll suggest to him that he look closely at their eyes, even the wrinkles around their mouths to determine where they truly stand. Be gentle, I'll tell him, and know that Judaism says we must be compassionate toward the stranger because you never know where they have just been or what they have just suffered. That is a reasonable lesson.

I didn't call the Denting Man that day or the next. I found out his wife died a few weeks later though, and I went to the shivah. While we sat together, the Denting Man told me about his boat trips around the world. No mention of the dent ever came up.

Israel fires back at Syria

Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — IDF tank units fired directly at a Syrian military target for the first time on Monday, scoring what was said to be a direct hit on a mobile artillery battery in Syria that had just launched a mortar shell into the Golan.

The mortar shell hit the border area inside Israeli territory near Tel Hazeka in the Golan Heights. No reports of injuries or damage were reported on either side.

On Sunday, the Israel Defence Forces fired an anti-tank missile close to Syrian forces as a warning, after a mortar bomb exploded near an IDF position in the same area.

The mortar fire from Syria is widely seen in Israel as constituting errant shells rather than deliberate attacks, but concern is mounting at the potential for casualties. A shell last week fell inside an Israeli moshav, but failed to explode. Residents said the consequences could have been disastrous had it done so.

The exchanges of fire, which have so far caused no injuries, are the first between the two countries since the end of the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

"We have no interest in getting in between the rebels and the Syrian army, but rather to defend the Golan Heights from stray fire," IDF spokesperson Brig.-Gen. Yoav Mordechai said Sunday.

Also on Sunday, Israel conveyed a message to Syria that it would respond to any further spillover of fighting into Israel with return fire.

Cotler Tables Motion

OTTAWA — Mount Royal MP and Liberal justice critic Irwin Cotler tabled a 15-point motion in Parliament last week urging that the issue of Jewish refugees who were forced out of Arab countries after Israel's founding be part of a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Cotler said he raised the issue in recent talks with Foreign Minister John Baird and hopes the committee on foreign affairs will hold hearings on the matter similar to those held by the U.S. Congress and the Italian and British parliaments. Cotler has testified before the latter as an expert witness.

Racist Jailed

OTTAWA — The Federal Court of Canada last week sentenced a Regina man to 30 days in jail for ignoring a Canadian Human Rights Tribunal order to stop posting hate messages online. Terry Tremaine, a former University of Saskatchewan math instructor and the founder and head of the National Socialist Party of Canada, was found in 2007 to have posted hate messages that were likely to expose blacks, Jews and other groups to hate. He was ordered to pay a fine and stop posting such messages, and when he didn't, he received a contempt order. Last week's ruling against him said that if he still refuses to take down his posts, he could face another six months in jail. In September, a different judge stayed a criminal hate charge against Tremaine, because his case was taking too long to get to trial.

B.C. Miner Charged For Anti-Jewish Posts

VANCOUVER — The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and B'nai Brith Canada applauded the B.C. attorney general for charging a Quesnel, B.C., miner last week with a hate crime for anti-Jewish content on his website.

Arthur Topham, 65, was charged Nov. 5 with promoting hatred against an identifiable group on his website, Radical Press. He has run the website, described by local media as anti-Zionist, since 1998.

The charge comes six months after police opened a criminal investigation into the site's content, the Toronto Sun reported. Topham was also charged with a firearms offence.

Complaints against the site, which has referred to Jews as snakes and Zionists, date back to 2007.

Topham also has posted materials against Jews, such as the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, on his site. "Judging from the wording of this indictment, it looks like it's going to be a battle between the Christians and the Jews," Topham wrote on the website last week.

Topham's lawyer, Doug Christie, has previously defended Holocaust deniers Ernst Zundel and James Keegstra. Christie told a local news radio station that Zionism is a political belief, "albeit connected effectively to Jewish groups, Jewish ideas," and that opposing a political belief is not a crime.

Hurricane strands students for a week

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A group of Toronto high school students made their way home from New York City after hurricane Sandy kept them on the ground for five days.

The students, from Bnei Akiva Schools, flew into the city on Oct. 26 for what they thought would be a weekend Shabbaton trip in Connecticut to learn ways to promote Yachad, an organization that helps people with disabilities.

The seven Toronto participants met up with hundreds of other students from around the United States, all of whom were nominated by their schools as people who have demonstrated community leadership, particularly in promoting Yachad in their schools, said Micha Gasner, who was volunteering as a chaperone for the retreat.

They spent the weekend at a conference centre in Connecticut, about 40 minutes from New York's LaGuardia Airport, participating in sessions on leadership and community involvement.

The Canadian group was set to fly home to Toronto at 3 p.m. on Oct. 28 – a Sunday. They arrived at the airport confident they would make it home despite rumours that the airport would be closing. But that didn't happen.

"They kept announcing the flight was being delayed because we were waiting for a crew member," Gasner said, explaining that they had no pilot. One was scheduled to arrive from Chicago after 9 p.m. Everybody waiting for other flights had left, Gasner said. Their flight was the only one left. Despite the airport's assurances that they would make it home that night, eventually the flight was cancelled.

The group exchanged their tickets for a Wednesday afternoon flight, and they called on their New York friends to find places to stay for the three days. But the hurricane continued.

Seldom have we heard in the American Jewish discourse – and even among so many Jews in Canada – such strongly worded and emotionally charged opinions about the now-re-elected president of the United States, Barack Obama.

The criticisms of President Obama were vocal and frequent. At first they were based upon disappointment, but by his midterm in office two years ago, they had morphed from disappointment to distrust and then to suspicion and active hostility on the part of many Jews.

The reasons for this attitude were a set or a subset of the following:

- His speech in Cairo four years ago was a form of presidential pandering to the Islamic world.
- He paved the path for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to seize a pretext concerning Jewish settlements in the West Bank to scuttle all peace negotiations with Israel.
- He embarrassed Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu by keeping him waiting in an anteroom near the Oval Office while he dined with his family.
- His secretary of state also embarrassed Netanyahu by berating him over the phone and ensuring the scolding was leaked to the media.
- He is too indulgent of Iran and of its rush to acquire nuclear weapons.
- He does not understand the true nature of the threat posed by radical Islam.
- He mishandled the Arab Spring.
- He did not find the time to visit Israel during his first term of office.
- And more.

To be sure, these reasons – singly or collectively – do indeed justify wariness toward Obama's Mideast policies. But a comprehensive, dispassionate examination of the wide range of disparate facets of Israel's

From the editor's desk...

Desultory U.S. election thoughts bilateral relations with the United States – military, scientific, cultural, commercial, academic, scholarly and more – suggests that the relationship between the two countries is on much more solid footing than the extreme disparagers of the president believe.

Moreover, it now appears that the disparagers are a minority in American Jewry.

According to JTA, nearly 70 per cent of the Jews who voted last week voted for Obama. This number was down from the 74 to 78 per cent (there is a difference of opinion regarding the true figure) of the Jewish vote he captured four years ago. Nevertheless, there is no denying his dominance among Jewish voters.

Who can say for sure, why?

What is clear, however, is that American Jewish voters cast their votes on the basis of a range of issues and not solely on the basis of the president's actual or perceived policies on Israel.

Or, the results may demonstrate the loyalty of the majority of the American Jewish voters to Obama because of – not despite – his Mideast policies.

The results may also indicate – but we do not know, nor can we say – that Israel plays a much lesser role in the overall world outlook and sense of self-identity of a great many American Jews than we might think is the case. (If true, this is a subject of considerable importance.)

Immediately after the election, Netanyahu conveyed his congratulations to Obama. He characterized Obama's victory as "a vote of confidence [by the American people] in your leadership." Obama returned the good deed by calling Netanyahu to personally thank him for his words of congratulations.

Dry Bones

CLASSIC

As the editor of the Times of Israel writes in the Perspectives essay in this edition, the nature of the personal relations between the two men will not be the determining factor in the nature of the bilateral relations between the two states.

And as a postscript, it is interesting to note that 32 Jews – 10 senators and 22 representatives – were elected last week to the 113th Congress of the United States. Thus, 10 senators out of 100 and 22 representatives out of 435 in the United States are Jewish. In Canada, by comparison, four senators out of 105 and three members of Parliament out of 305 are Jews.

The comparison is only interesting, but not really instructive, since our electoral system is vastly different from that of our neighbours, and the Jewish community in the United States (5.5 million out of 315 million) is – in relative and in absolute terms – larger than the community in Canada (375,000 out of 35 million). –MBD

Police refuse to lay charges against madrassah

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

York Regional Police will not lay hate promotion charges against an east end Islamic school, despite a curriculum that "suggested intolerance" and "challenged some of Canada's core values."

In a report on the East End Madrassah released last week, York police concluded that while the school's syllabus was problematic, it was "non-criminal."

"The manner of teaching remains unknown and as such there is no conclusive proof to reasonably believe the hurtful and offensive text was promoted in a manner that would qualify as hate propaganda," stated the report by Det.-Const. Mark Topping.

The police report, however, acknowledged that the content of a paragraph headed "End of Jewish Plots and Treacheries" employed language that "is of concern" and targeted "the impressionable mind of a 13-14-year old."

The East End Madrassah is one of the several affiliated organizations linked to the Islamic Shia Ithna Asheri Jamaat of Toronto (ISIJ), which is located at 9000 Bathurst St. in Thornhill. Its website, Jafari.org, which hosts ISIJ, refers to several affiliated Islamic schools, including the East End Madrassah.

The material in question was used for several years and taught to at least 80 students. The East End Madrassah rented space in the David and Mary Thompson Collegiate in Scarborough, a public school operated by the Toronto District School Board (TDSB). The TDSB has subsequently revoked the Madrassah's permit and the school has relocated elsewhere.

In a section headed "the Purpose of Jihad," the material contrasts Islam with the "beliefs of the ancient Romans, the Jews and the Nazis."

Syllabus intolerant but 'non-criminal'

A section headed "End of Jewish Plots and Treacheries" calls Jews "treacherous" and "crafty." It also refers to "Jewish plots and aggression" as well as "Jewish intrigues and conspiracies in Arabia."

Despite the nature of the curriculum, the report noted that, "In the approximately seven years that the syllabus was circulated, there have been no concerns voiced by students, parents or staff regarding content."

Last May, however, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) denounces the curriculum: "Using religion to promote hatred among youth is not just offensive and abhorrent – it shows a stunning disregard for Canada's basic values of decency and tolerance."

Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) went further, calling for a hate crime prosecution. Last week, FSWC CEO Avi Benlolo said he was disappointed police declined to lay charges.

"We believe that the fact that the police conducted an investigation and produced a paper trail that is more extensive than the report states and is now available to police forces across the countries is an excellent start," Benlolo said.

Noting that the questionable materials originated in Iran, he said, "This is not just about the East End Madrassah. This is the tip of the iceberg."

Responding to the police report, ISIJ president Aliraza Rajani stated, "Our teachings embrace and celebrate the Canadian values of tolerance, understanding and harmony. 'Our organization has felt sadness and disappointment at the rush to judgment and harsh comments directed toward us..."

"We are especially disappointed that the FSWC refused our invitation to meet and discuss their concerns directly at the outset of this issue, choosing instead to go first to the media and then to make it an extremely costly and disruptive police matter. We believe that all of this could have been avoided if they had simply been willing to talk. And we continue to be disappointed by the FSWC's attempts to paint our organization in the worst possible light, by re-publishing the material in question even though we removed the material from our website as soon as we were alerted to its presence."

Benlolo rejected suggestions raised by Madrassah representatives and cited in the police report that educators were unaware of the materials. He called the school's press release last May following disclosure of the material, "unapologetic."

"They pleaded ignorance," Benlolo commented. "I don't know how you can be an educator and not know what was in there."

In a news release, CIJA commended York Regional Police "for their quick and diligent review of this matter."

However, CIJA's senior vice-president Howard English said the organization never believed the incident would lead to criminal charges, given the difficulty in proving hate promotion.

Nevertheless, "based on the East End Madrassah situation, of course we would be concerned about what is being taught in other schools," he said.

Deaf, again, to all pleas

Because he knows that he is immune from most censure by the West and from any censure by the vast majority of the 193 member states of the United Nations General Assembly, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, has once again decided to ask the General Assembly to recognize a Palestinian state.

Abbas spurned a personal plea from newly re-elected U.S. President Barack Obama to desist from the UN application, merely four days after Obama's re-election.

Obama called Abbas. The two men had what was described by an Abbas aide as a long conversation. Obama pleaded with Abbas to return to negotiations with Israel. As he did last year, Abbas rebuffed the American president.

Abbas emphasized on Sunday that he would proceed, probably this month, with the application to the UN. But to abate the sting of a rather public, insensitive brush-off of the electorally reinvigorated Obama, Abbas added new, softer content to his rejection.

"We will turn to the United Nations," Abbas said, "even though they [the United States] do not want us to do this... We do not want to deny the legitimacy of Israel; only the legitimacy of the settlements" (our emphasis).

But given Abbas' harsh, scathingly anti-Israel address to the UN in September and his recent about-face regarding his perceived moderation in the demand for the Palestinians' "right of return" (See According to Reports on page 16) it is hard to accept this statement by Abbas as being sincere.

"Some powers are trying to tell us that the two-state solution doesn't come from the UN but through negotiations," Abbas also said. "Negotiations are crucial. But to get UN recognition is also key" (our emphasis).

In this casual, almost throwaway sentence lies the real purpose of Abbas' strategy. Upgraded UN status lends more weight and added prestige to his quasi-diplomatic manoeuvrings on the international stage. But even more significant, upgraded UN status entitles the Palestinians access to the other UN agencies.

Abbas has his sights set on the International Criminal Court of Justice, which he would use as the next battleground in the propaganda war to delegitimize the Jewish state.

Thus, for Abbas to deny wanting to delegitimize Israel rings quite hollow in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary.

The Palestinians circulated a draft resolution at the United Nations last week. They seek support from the General Assembly to raise their status to that of a non-member observer state. And they seek support from the Security Council to approve a petition for full UN membership.

A Palestinian state will be established only through negotiations with Israel, Obama told Abbas. But Abbas, to the continued detriment of his people, once again turned a deaf ear to the American president who so desperately wants to help him.

During a three-day Arab summit in Amman, Jordan's King Hussein won endorsement for an international peace conference with Israel. Among those agreeing to the plan were Syrian president Hafez Assad and Iraqi president Saddam Hussein.

Will Obama keep his promises?

It remains to be seen if the pre-election promises U.S. President Barack Obama made with regard to Israel will be kept. The most important of these was backing Israel in its ongoing dispute with Iran over Iran's nuclear program, which Israel and the rest of the world fears will end with Iran possessing nuclear bombs. While sanctions imposed on Iran by the UN have had a severe effect on the Iranian economy, Iran still cheats by trading with Russia and China. It remains to be seen whether Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's successor (Iran will soon have national elections) is less hostile to Israel and may show compromise on the issue of nuclear development.

The next major decision with regard to Israel that Obama must face is Egypt with its Muslim Brotherhood government, which hints from time to time that it will abrogate the peace treaty with Israel. Will Obama end military and economic aid to Egypt if the treaty is not honoured?

Another important issue facing Obama is the decision by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to apply to the UN for membership. American financial aid to the PA can be a deterrent in preventing such a move, which would shatter hopes of a peaceful agreement between the Palestinians and Israelis.

Last, but not least, Obama will have to face the deteriorating situation in Syria. Hostilities have spilled over into Lebanon and Turkey, and even into the Golan Heights, which could bring Israel's military into a confrontation with Syrian forces.

Obama will also have to repair the American economy during his second four-year term. We have no choice but to wish him well on foreign and domestic fronts.

Calls to ban anti-Israel groups ineffective

Lawrence Hart's recent column, "Where is our advocacy?" (Nov. 1), is sadly misguided. As polling research demonstrates, the majority of Canadians are uninterested in the Mideast conflict. This is why anti-Israel seminars and displays rarely draw more than a few dozen regular, hard-core activists. An effective advocacy response does not consist of trying to ban such groups altogether, but rather mitigating their capacity to reach mainstream Canadians. Ironically, public calls to ban such groups are not only ineffective – they end up creating a "buzz" around the event in the media, which in turn generates a larger audience.

This is why the Jewish Federation of Hamilton, with the national support of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), decided to urge the Hamilton Public Library to move the exhibit, A Child's View from Gaza, to a less prominent space, while at the same time pushing for equal opportunity for a pro-Israel display. Indeed, the fact that the exhibit has toured other Ontario cities – drawing neither media coverage nor significant audiences – testifies to effectiveness of our approach. In this case, Israel's opponents have failed to earn the attention of the general public. The last thing we should do is give them the oxygen they crave.

Hart's article praises those in Hamilton who have chosen not to remain silent. But Hart's view appears to be a minority opinion within the Hamilton Jewish community. Indeed, Hamilton Federation received tremendous support from a wide spectrum within the local community for the way it handled this issue.

On Nov. 5, federation's public relations committee met with the library officials to continue further discussions on how to prevent similar occurrences in future. A summary of that meeting will be sent to the community shortly.

Larry Szpirglas, President, Hamilton Jewish Federation

David Somer, Hamilton Representative of CIJA

Betrayal of trust for Zionists

In light of Israel's repeated violations of their agreements to respect the ban on the building of settlements, it's hardly a "Betrayal of Trust" (Oct. 25) by the 15 Protestant leaders to ask the U.S. Congress to investigate possible violations of Israeli's adherence to bilateral agreements. Having first visited Israel in 1947, I have been a committed Zionist all my life. But the Israel of today is not the same Israel of those years. The true betrayal of trust for Zionists is how far Israel has strayed from the country that we Zionists saw as a light unto the world.

Let's not exaggerate Obama-Netanyahu rift

David Horowitz
The Times of Israel

Early on election night in the United States, when the first projection for Virginia came through and put the state as "too close" to call, Britain's Sky News did a drill-down of Virginia voters' reasons for their presidential choice.

Lots of voters who had plumped for the Republican candidate, Mitt Romney, said they had done so primarily because of concerns about the economy. Many of those who had chosen President Barack Obama – he ultimately took the state – said they had done so first and foremost because of his policies on health care. For what percentage of Virginia voters had foreign policy been the key issue that determined their vote? Zero. That's right – zero per cent!

It was a sobering if unsurprising indicator of the American electorate's priorities – a reminder for Israelis and others who are obsessed with the nuances of the Israeli-American relationship, and concerned about the regional challenges faced by the Jewish state and its distant ally, that the obsession is not widely shared among the 300 million-plus citizens of the United States.

Israel and its challenges, it is worth further remembering, are by no means the main foreign policy concern of those not-foreign-policy-obsessed Americans. The United States has troops on the ground in foreign conflict zones. It is still reeling from the recent murder of its ambassador to Libya in a terrorist attack. As the thrust of the presidential debate on the subject made clear, insofar as Americans focus on foreign policy, their priority may well be seeking to avoid deploying on any new international battlefields. Having watched both Obama and his failed would-be successor assure them, in that debate, that they would strive mightily to avoid opening any such fresh military fronts, the overwhelming majority of voters put the matter aside, and made their presidential choice for a variety of reasons closer to home.

That is not to say, of course, that second term Obama will henceforth devote a matching zero per cent of his precious time to foreign policy. But as his impassioned victory speech showed with incandescent clarity, he knows full well that his people's priorities relate to the domestic well-being of the United States.

You wouldn't realize much of this, however, if your information on the American presidential election had been derived from the Hebrew media recently. Our newspapers, radio shows and TV news broadcasts have, quite rightly, been full of reports and analysis of Obama's victory and Romney's defeat. Rightly, too, they have pondered the implications of Obama's re-election for this region, for the battle to thwart Iran, for Israel. But they have also overflowed with disclosures dramatically highlighting the damage ostensibly done to Israel by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's supposed intervention "on the losing side" – to quote the headline across page 6 of our biggest-selling daily, Yediot Achronot, on Nov. 8.

So much attention has been devoted to the issue of Netanyahu's purported wrong bet, you'd be forgiven for thinking that his stance on the elections was a key factor in the presidential race – that it was a veritable wonder that Obama managed to beat his challenger at all, given all that potent ammunition fired at him from the prime minister's office in Jerusalem.

The evidence of Netanyahu's alleged political crime is sketchy – largely focused on his public disagreement with the administration about the need for clear red lines to stop Iran; the fact that clips of Netanyahu taking positions at odds with the administration on Iran were used in Republican campaign advertisements, and the warmth with which he hosted Romney here this summer.

Netanyahu did make public the Israeli differences with the United States on Iran – precisely as did the Obama administration regarding its differences with Israel. U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Martin Dempsey all but derided Israel's military capacity, and Dempsey memorably said he would not wish to be "complicit" in an Israeli strike.

Netanyahu also encapsulated Israel's objections to the United States "no red lines on Iran" policy in a few memorable, political ad-ready sound-bites, at his press conference with the visiting Bulgarian prime minister in September: "The world tells Israel to wait because there is still time. And I ask: Wait for what? Until when?" he said. "Those in the international community who refuse to put red lines before Iran don't have a moral right to place a red light before Israel." To which Obama hit back with remarks about shutting out all the "noise" when considering American interests. A case of overt policy disagreement on Iran? Absolutely. Intervention in the presidential election campaign? Something of a stretch.

But exaggeration (the welcome afforded Romney this summer, for instance, differed in no significant way from the warm reception given to candidate Obama in 2008) and hyperbolic commentary can make even such minor "evidence" go a long way.

Then presidential candidate Barack Obama visited Sderot in 2008. (Israel Sun photo)

Underpinning the media focus is a domestic political game. The most bitter public critic of Netanyahu's asserted pro-Romney favouritism is the man who preceded him as prime minister and reportedly entertains ambitions to succeed him as well: Ehud Olmert.

Earlier this month, Olmert accused Netanyahu, though not by name, of "spitting" in Obama's face. Afterward, he did name and sought to shame Netanyahu, charging that the prime minister's displayed preference for Romney had broken "all the rules" and risked damaging Israeli ties with the Obama administration.

Netanyahu may well be personally disappointed that his old friend Romney, did not win the presidency.

He may feel, as do many Israelis, that Obama has no gut affiliation with Israel – unlike, say, former presidents Bill Clinton and George W. Bush (this is an emotional, not a partisan thing). He may also well feel, as do many Israelis that Obama is sending tough enough messages to the Iranians about the imperative that they halt their nuclear drive.

But he also presumably has the wisdom to realize that re-election for Obama saved us all six months, while a president-elect Romney would have had to wait more than two months to take over and had to hire and gear-up an administration before he could possibly have focused on Iran. And he doubtless recognizes that there are no guarantees that a first-term Romney would have been more capable of mustering support for a resort to force if necessary than a second-term president who has credibly sought to thwart Iran via sanctions and diplomacy.

We in Israel have a problem with the Americans over Iran. It's a problem we would have if Romney had won last week. It's a problem that doesn't stem from Netanyahu's personal presidential preference or the degree to which he did – or did not – display it.

Our problem is that we are physically closer to Iran than the United States. We are more immediately threatened by Iran than the United States, and our military capacity to inflict damage on the Iranian nuclear program is more limited than that of the United States – and may be about to disappear altogether. All this at a time when Obama, Romney and most other key players in the United States, just about everybody else in the international community, and plenty of very credible Israeli experts, are still championing the prospect of non-military action thwarting Iran's drive to the bomb.

It is complicated still more by the fact that if we hold our fire now – as many of our most credible security chiefs believe we should – we will essentially be subcontracting our security to other international players and most relevantly to an America that simply does not want to open new areas of conflict. If those many local and overseas experts are right and the Iranian program is halted with no need for a resort to military action, then we can all breathe a collective sigh of relief and sing the praises of those whose cumulative pressure apparently persuaded Netanyahu not to strike thus far. If they're wrong, however, it will soon be too late for Israel to do much about it.

These are grave, fateful matters, that require nuanced, careful examination and handling – by politicians who should not let personal preferences or interests skew their judgments, and by the writers and commentators who convey these issues to the public. Reducing the dilemmas faced by the West regarding Iran, but most urgently by Israel, to a distorted focus on partisan preferences and personal frictions risks obscuring the genuine complexities.

In the case of Netanyahu and Obama, it also happens to be profoundly insulting – and not just to the prime minister. After heaping scorn on Netanyahu for his dereliction of the wider national interest in the cause of more marginal personal and political considerations, the critics warn that a rankled Obama might seek revenge for such slights in a way that would damage all of Israel.

"Anyone who knows the president understands that this is not how he thinks," U.S. Ambassador to Israel Dan Shapiro said, adding that talk of presidential revenge against Israel for Netanyahu's political preferences was "ridiculous." What a vindictive, mean-spirited little man Obama would be if he did think and act that way. Yet that's precisely what Netanyahu's accusers are suggesting.

By indicating that Israel should now brace for the wrath of a score-settling U.S. president infuriated by Netanyahu's ostensible intervention, they are implying that Obama is no more capable than Netanyahu of putting aside personal grudge and preference, no more capable of holding firm to his nation's wider interest.

Let's make space at the Wall for everyone

What if you lived in a place where you could be arrested and detained for praying the Shema, laying from the Torah, or even holding a sefer Torah? Most of us, if we were in that situation and had viable options, would hightail it out to a more Jew-friendly locale.

How ironic that this forbidding place is in Jerusalem – at least if you're a woman. In what appears to be an escalating attempt to defeat the group of women who wish nothing more than to daven together at the Western Wall, Jerusalem authorities have stepped up arrests of women who pray in a group, read Torah, or wear tallitot at the Wall. Most recently, the head of Women of the Wall was arrested while saying Shema aloud at the Kotel, and – she has alleged – she was detained and roughly treated before being released without charges.

Who owns the Wall? The Jewish People? God? Everyone? No one? It turns out that a small group of people own it, at least in the sense of dictating its use. For many years now, Nashot HaKotel – Women of the Wall – have convened at the Kotel for women's prayer groups, on Rosh Chodesh and on other occasions.

Their praying offends the sensibilities of the haredi rabbinic authorities who control this most sacred of Jewish spaces. Over the years, they have authorized aggressive tactics to bar women's prayer groups at the Wall – tactics that include physical intimidation, such as yelling, pushing, spitting, and even hurling objects at the women, legal means, such as successfully arguing for the right to control the space, and police enforcement.

What harm do the women do? They don't compel those who see their minyanim as un-halachic or offensive to participate in them. They don't make incursions into the men's area or try to topple the mechitzah. They don't try to ban from this most Jewish of spaces folks whose sexism they find offensive. They just want to pray together and aloud, as we do in shul and as men do at the Kotel.

Although the women represent different denominations of Judaism with different sets of understanding about how women may pray, they come together under a rubric that satisfies most Orthodox authorities. But those who oppose them, a minority and stringent group within Judaism, see themselves as bearers of a singular truth and don't see other views as valid. Indeed, their opposition to women praying together is one of many acts to solidify their power – acts that include denying or even retroactively reversing conversions performed by any rabbi not on their limited list of approval, including most modern Orthodox rabbis. With Women of the Wall, they assert control of Jewish space, as they have of Jewish life and identity in other arenas.

Sara R. Horowitz

The more vexing question is why the implicated secular institutions affirm the right of this ultra-stringent strand of Judaism to absolute control over the Kotel plaza, rather than seeking a golden mean to address the needs of all concerned parties. How did we arrive at the state of affairs, where the secular branches of government reinforce the interpretations and sensibilities of one particular religious approach, one set of ideas about women and prayer?

Perhaps it is precisely because these bodies are secular that the issue of prayer simply doesn't really matter. For many secular Israelis, religious practice is something akin to a relic from the past – even if it's treasured, it's no longer a living presence. They don't empathize with the spiritual drive that impels the women who chant at the Wall. More cynically, one could say that they, too, trade in power.

A well-known midrash relates that the Temple – whose retaining wall is the Kotel – was destroyed because of sinat chinam, undifferentiated hatred within the Jewish community of that time. How ironic and how sad that on its ruins a wedge has been driven, dividing Israeli Jews from one another and from Diaspora Jews. It's time to make space for everyone.

Hiding Jewish origins is futile and pathetic

The formal notice of the passing of Walter Carsen, the renowned Canadian patron of the arts who died last month shortly after his 100th birthday, stated that he was "of German origin." He's said to have described himself as "European." In fact, he was Jewish, as are his two children, which they only found out from their mother when they were in their teens.

Carsen's parents were murdered in Auschwitz. For much of his life, he was estranged from his brother who had escaped to South America, perhaps because the latter had affirmed his Jewishness.

In a lengthy obituary by Paula Citron in the Globe and Mail on Oct. 13, we read that Carsen was born in Cologne into a family of assimilated Jews, fled to England to escape the Nazis and was deported in 1940 to Canada as "an enemy alien" together became Czechoslovakia into a Yiddish-speaking family. Virtually all its members perished in the Shoah. For a long time, he tried to conceal his Jewish origins and was even said to read the Lesson in the Anglican Church close to his stately home.

Encouraged by his non-Jewish wife and probably provoked by antisemitic slurs as his business empire began to unravel, he came to acknowledge his roots by promoting Holocaust education and supporting Israel. He was buried on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem. One of the eulogies was delivered by then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir, in which he hinted at Maxwell's services to Israeli intelligence.

Maxwell, like other Holocaust survivors who settled in Britain, remained conflicted about his past and tried to appear more British than the British. But when his financial misconduct became known, his detractors called him "the bouncing Czech."

Unlike Carsen, who by all accounts was a very successful and highly respected businessman, Maxwell turned out to have stolen countless millions from his company. This and his alleged involvement with Israeli intelligence gave rise to many speculations about how he died.

In her memoir, A Mind of My Own, his wife, Elizabeth, explores the complexity of her husband's character and his burning desire for acceptance. She seeks to fathom what it does for a person's identity when it's coupled with an insatiable urge for wealth and recognition, and manifest in the mistaken – in Maxwell's case – belief that having survived Hitler makes you invincible.

That belief included Maxwell's very tortured relationship with his wife, which ended in estrangement. Something similar is reported in Citron's obituary of Carsen.

The late Chaim Bermant, a distinguished British-Jewish journalist and author, wrote about Maxwell: "The fact that he had fought in the war and been decorated for valour by Montgomery, that he had a stately home in Oxford, was a member of Parliament and was married to a Christian woman who was every inch a lady, did not, however, make him an English gentleman."

Canada is more accommodating to ambitious immigrants. The fact that Carsen had given away most of his fortune to the arts, that he was the recipient of numerous awards, including the Order of Canada, and that several institutions and funds bear his name did make him the Canadian equivalent of a British gentleman.

But it's tragic that in the process he should have tried to conceal his Jewishness. Had he acknowledged his origins with pride, it's very likely that he would have died no less honoured but very much happier. Carsen and his ilk remind us that hiding one's Jewishness is both futile and pathetic.

The murderous fate of the shtetl

Of the 3.3 million Jews in Poland on the eve of World War II, well over one-third lived in smaller communities in the eastern half of the country, known in Polish as the Kresy. Many resided in fabled shtetlach.

Yehuda Bauer, a professor emeritus of Holocaust studies at the Hebrew University and now Yad Vashem's academic adviser, has written a slim but illuminating book on the Kresy's Jews, The Death of the Shtetl (Yale University Press). Since, as he claims, the shtetl is an under-researched aspect of Holocaust historiography, this useful volume should fill in gaps in our knowledge. Bauer focuses on a dozen shtetlach, including Kosow, Buczacz and Zborow. Some are no longer part of Poland, lying within the frontiers of Ukraine and Belarus.

Sheldon Kirshner

Polish Jews, particularly in the Kresy, faced mounting economic problems.

Pre-World War I Poland, having been under Russian and Austrian rule, had access to lucrative markets in the east and the west. But with the advent of Polish independence, these mercantile connections broke down, torn asunder by nationalistic protectionist policies. The Soviet Union, for example, closed the door to normal trade with Poland.

As a result, there was much hardship, aggravated by the Depression. By the 1930s, three out of 10 Jews lived below in the poverty line in Poland, and in the Kresy, the situation was just as dire.

Compounding the problem was the rise of an exclusivist Polish nationalism, which regarded Jews as foreigners and an unassimilable negative influence on Polish society. This ethnocentric view was represented in its most radical form by the intellectual/politician Roman Dmowski.

Dmowski's National Democratic party, whose antisemitic members referred to themselves as Endeks, gained a large number of followers among university students and professionals. The Endeks placed pressure on Jews by calling for their emigration and by supporting boycotts against Jewish shopkeepers, pedlars and merchants. After 1935, the Polish government itself adopted Dmowski's racist platform. Even left-of-centre parties that were nominally allies of Jews advocated mass Jewish emigration, says Bauer.

Amid this anti-Jewish climate, a succession of pogroms erupted, claiming the lives of 350 Jews. In 1936, the prime minister, Felicjan Slawoj-Skladkowski, declared in parliament that while physical attacks on Jews were deplorable, boycotts were acceptable.

With the outbreak of the war, Germany and the Soviet Union divided Poland into two separate zones in accordance with the non-aggression pact, and the Kresy fell temporarily under Russian domination.

Jews, fearing that German rule would mean violent persecution and remembering the state-sanctioned antisemitism of the 1930s, welcomed Soviet troops. So did some Ukrainians. "From the Jewish perspective, Nazi Germany was life-threatening, whereas the Soviet Union was merely oppressive," writes Bauer.

Within the first few months of their occupation, the Soviets nationalized companies and banks, abolished ethnic communal institutions and political parties and introduced the ruble as legal tender, thereby wiping out the savings of middle-class citizens in one bold stroke. And in a bid to alter the Kresy's demographic structure and strengthen the profile of Ukrainians and Belorussians, they deported large numbers of Poles and Jews. Nonetheless, as Bauer points out, Jews fared reasonably well.

But all bets were off after Germany declared war on the Soviet Union and conquered towns in the Kresy such as Grodno, Lida, Slonim, Luck, Dubno and Stryj.

During their first sweep in July and August 1941, the Nazis murdered tens of thousands of Jews, singling out Jewish community leaders and intellectuals. And in line with the precedents established in western Poland, the Germans immediately created Jewish councils, or Judenrate.

By December 1942, the majority of Jews in the Kresy had been killed, with the remainder dispatched to labour camps. Bauer says that one-fifth of the victims of the Holocaust in Poland were from the shtetlach.

In chapter six of The Death of the Shtetl, Bauer examines a pivotal issue – the attitude of Christians toward Jews. His verdict is that Jews were generally treated with indifference, suspicion and hostility, though he cites instances when Jews were helped by sympathetic neighbours. As he explains, "The Holocaust in Poland was probably easier for the Germans to implement because the Jews were an oppressed and increasingly vulnerable population, often intensely disliked by their Polish neighbours..."

Minorities, the Czechs in Volhynia, for example, tended to be less anti-Jewish and sometimes decidedly pro-Jewish. Old Believers – Christians who observed the Jewish sabbath – and Ukrainian Baptist-Mennonites were especially helpful to Jews, according to Bauer. "Their emphasis on the Old Testament led them to see Jews as God's Chosen People, and since rescuing a Jew was certain to lead to an afterlife in Paradise, they did all they could to rescue Jews."

Most peasants who agreed to help Jews demanded payment. But hiding Jews was risky. Ukrainian nationalists murdered every peasant who was found to conceal them.

Bauer speculates that upward of 35,000 Jews escaped into the dense forests, some forming family camps and still others joining partisan bands. In his estimation, 5,000 to 7,000 Jewish escapees were murdered by bandits. Soviet and Polish partisans also killed Jews, motivated by antisemitism and a desire to acquire their possessions and to cut down on the number of mouths to feed.

By 1945, the Kresy, with its network of shtetlach, was virtually bereft of Jews, signifying the end of an era.

Syrian uprising harms Iranian interests: analyst

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

You can count Jonathan Spyer as among that group of analysts who doesn't believe Israel will attack Iran's nuclear arms program any time soon.

It's not that he doesn't believe Iran is a threat — he does — but he believes only the United States has the military wherewithal to seriously put a dent in the country's nuclear program. Israel can't do enough damage to warrant all the serious repercussions that would arise should it attack, he believes.

Instead, Israel's leadership is trying to light a fire under friendly governments to step up the sanctions and put more pressure on the Iranians.

Spyer, a senior research fellow at the Global Research in International Affairs Center in Herzliya, Israel, was in Toronto on Nov. 2 as a guest of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

In a wide-ranging interview with The C/N, the British-born analyst said Iran's nuclear program is not aimed at Israel in particular. Instead, it is a key component in the country's larger strategic goal of becoming a regional hegemon, dominating the small oil-producing Gulf States and eventually getting a stranglehold on the production of petroleum. That will allow Iran to put pressure on oil-consuming countries and permit it to become a real power on the world stage, he said.

Iran already dominates a Shia arc that stretches from Iraq to Syria and Lebanon. Like the ancient Persians, Iran seeks an outlet to the Mediterranean Sea, but its strategy is in danger of being set back by events in Syria. There, its Sunni rivals, including Turkey, Saudi Arabia and Qatar, are supporting anti-Assad forces that could overthrow the longstanding regime, he said.

Should they be successful, these groups are not going to replace the Assad tyranny, which has killed upward of 30,000 people, with a democracy. Instead, expect a repressive Sunni regime, but one that can hardly be as hostile to Israel as the current government, he said.

Israel and other western states favour a change in regime, since that could be seen as a blow to Iranian ambitions, he continued. What's more, "the regime that replaces him won't be worse in terms of human rights."

Spyer, whose main area of interest is Syria, has first-hand knowledge of the country. He twice entered Syria in 2012 — without government permission — once in February and again in September.

The first time, with the aid of smugglers, he rode across the Turkey/Syria frontier on a horse at night.

In September, he crossed the border in broad daylight and drove all the way to Aleppo. In the six months between the visits, the Assad regime lost its grip on the north. "The Assad regime does not exist" in that area, he said.

While he was in Aleppo, the Dar Al-Shi-fa Hospital was bombed from the air, with Syrian forces employing primitive barrel bombs stuffed with shrapnel.

Jonathan Spyer

"It feels to be like wild flailing by the regime, punishing the people for supporting the rebels," he said.

The civil war in Syria, along with the Arab Spring has proven a setback for Iran. It can no longer bill itself as the main "centre for Islamic opposition," he said.

Turning to Egypt, Spyer said the Muslim Brotherhood-dominated government can be expected to honour the peace treaty with Israel. It must do so to retain western aid and avoid mass starvation.

However, there is "a breakdown of order in Sinai," of the kind not seen since before the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty, he continued. And Egyptian culture and its education system is dominated by anti-Israel and antisemitic discourse.

He blasted U.S. President Barack Obama's policy of abandoning longtime ally Hosni Mubarak. "It was not inevitable that a Muslim Brotherhood take over," he said.

Instead, the United States could have orchestrated a stand-down by Mubarak, after which the army would have handled the transition to a new government, he suggested. The recent attack on the American consulate and safe house in Benghazi, Libya, "shows that Al Qaeda and extremism is by no means finished... and will manifest in the future."

Islamism, with its anti-western agenda, poses "a danger for women's rights, minority rights, Christian rights and homosexual rights," he said.

"These are going to be immensely repressive societies."

Western governments, which supported the Libyan rebels, have forgotten how to build patron/client relations in the Middle East and retain influence.

"We've been handing power and influence to the wrong people... The value of western coin in the Middle East is at the lowest level in generations. Western countries look weak," he said.

New Haifa U president warns of Israeli brain drain

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The brain drain looms as a threat to Israel's well-being, the new president of the University of Haifa has warned.

"Israel's brain drain endangers Israel's academia and threatens its future," said Amos Shapira, who took office last month.

Calling on Israel "to wake up" to the reality that Israeli university graduates, many of them scientists, are leaving the country, he urged the Israeli government to reverse this trend.

"The State of Israel has issued many statements on the importance of reversing the brain drain," said Shapira, the former president of El Al Airlines and Cellcom, Israel's leading cellular provider. "But in practice, most of the scientists leaving the country are not coming back."

They'll only return if they're given with what he called "the most advanced research infrastructures possible."

To ensure this happens, he added, Israel must invest in such facilities.

Haifa U is working on this problem and is in the process of establishing a research pavilion to house returning scientists, Shapira said.

"There we will provide them with avant-garde laboratories and equipment," said Shapira, who was in Toronto on a visit last week.

"At the end of the day, many of these scientists truly wish to live in, research in and contribute to Israel. I'm sure that projects such as this pavilion will bring them back to Israel happily."

Shapira – a Haifa U graduate in economics who holds an MA in industrial management from the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology – said Israel's "primary resource" is its "human capital."

"Since Israel is a geographically small country that does not abound in natural resources, investing in human capital is critical to its security, strength and future."

In recent years, the government has given universities more funding than in the past, but more is needed, said Shapira, whose last posting was as president of Tel Aviv University's Friends Association.

Lamenting the "weakened status" of humanities studies at Israeli universities, he said this situation must be remedied. "In my previous position, I spearheaded a pact, signed by Israel's leading firms, promoting the employment of humanities graduates in the business sector," he said.

Humanities are important because they foster independent and critical thinking, he argued. "Undermining the humanities undermines not only Israel's cultural development, but its economic growth."

Shapira said he's pleased to be president of his alma mater, succeeding Aaron Ben-Ze'ev.

"For me, coming back is coming full circle," said Shapira, who was a teaching assistant at Haifa University and sometimes rides around on a Harley Davidson motorcycle.

"I'm proud to be returning to the university where I took my first steps and which gave me the crucial framework for success, both professionally and personally."

Asked what his broad goals are, Shapira replied, "Haifa University has grown and continues to develop from year to year, and my main role is to make sure that growth continues."

More specifically, Shapira said his objective is to advance the university's academic and research standards, which are already high and are recognized both in Israel and abroad.

Haifa U has taken the lead in such disciplines as brain research, education, law, art therapy, psychology and Holocaust studies, he noted.

But in order to retain its competitive edge, it must increase the range of its courses and further strengthen its position in the natural and exact sciences.

The university has two additional strategic tasks, he said.

First, it must solidify its status as one of two research universities in northern Israel. (The other is the Technion). "The existence of a research university in the northern region is critical for the economic viability of the north."

Second, Haifa U should continue to be a mosaic of "shared social and cultural experience" for Jews and Arabs and secular and religious Jews alike.

Shapira, a father of three grown children whose 90-year-old mother was a teacher, rebutted criticism that an academic rather than a businessman should be at the helm of a university.

"I bring with me much experience in managing large organizations, the ability to merge and co-ordinate intricate operations, and the ability to advance organizations and significantly improve their competitive edge," he declared. "But above all, I bring a deep passion to education."

Consul general answers media's spin of leaked report

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

News out of Israel earlier this month suggesting that DJ Schneeweiss, the country's new consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, had written a report that harms the Jewish state's interests were "spun out of context," the diplomat told The CJSN.

While he did prepare a classified report for the Israeli Foreign Ministry that provided a "comprehensive assessment of the assault on Israel's legitimacy," it was submitted in his prior capacity as the ministry's director of civil society affairs, in which he led efforts to counter the delegitimization of Israel on the international scene.

DJ Schneeweiss

The July report, parts of which were released by Israel's Ma'ariv newspaper, summarized his three years in that position, he said, and was not meant for public consumption. Rather, it was strictly for "internal deliberation and integration of the findings into how we handle ourselves" with respect to delegitimization.

It was not a critique of the government's policies, as suggested by some Israeli media outlets, he said.

"My report didn't engage in a substantive discussion of Israel's policy positions regarding the peace process or anything else. Insofar as it touched on those policy matters, it did so with respect to the tactical management and conduct of our public diplomacy against the background of the anti-Israel campaign. There was no value judgment or policy options" submitted, he said.

Schneeweiss took over for former consul general Amir Gissin this past August.

Speaking at his office last week, Schneeweiss said reports in Ma'ariv and The Times of Israel in early November made it seem that he was criticizing the government for its policies in the West Bank and at the United Nations, specifically with regard to how Israel's relations with the Palestinians helps delegitimization activists.

In his report, Schneeweiss argued that issues such as Israel's insistence that the Palestinians recognize Israel as a Jewish state and the government's fierce opposition to any change in the Palestinians' status at the UN have little impact on Israel's actual legitimacy.

He said that while there are many good reasons to oppose the Palestinian attempt to achieve non-member status at the UN - "For one, it outflanks the peace process," he said - arguing that it poses a threat to Israel's legitimacy is not one of them.

"There is nothing inherent in the manoeuvrings by the Palestinians at the UN that challenges the legitimacy of Israel," Schneeweiss said.

Similarly, he argued, whether the Palestinians do or do not recognize Israel as a Jewish state doesn't affect Israel's legitimacy either.

He said one of the "key insights" in his report is that Israel should be "more disciplined" when it comes to the language it uses to describe delegitimization efforts.

Specifically, the government should "avoid falling into the trap of describing every disagreement with Israeli positions as an assault on our very existence. There is a tendency, in some quarters, to do just that."

Israel's credibility isn't well served by misrepresenting the degree of hostility by anti-Israel activists to it, he argued.

"There is a price you pay to credibility when you imply that every single time someone disagrees with you they're actually trying to end your existence. We have to be more disciplined" than that, he said.

Schneeweiss added: "The way that my report was spun was that it was somehow a challenge to Israeli positions [on dealing with the Palestinians and anti-Israel activism]. It's quite the opposite, the report was saying 'These are our positions. How can we do them better?'"

He said his report tried to convey a "sense of proportion" to policymakers of what effect things such as "flotillas" and so-called "flytillas" actually have on Israel's legitimacy.

"Just because someone has the intent or makes the attempt to delegitimize you doesn't mean you actually have been delegitimized," Schneeweiss said.

He added: "In the 65 years that we've had our state... Palestinian recognition of Israel itself or its Jewish character has never been one of the sources of [Israel's] legitimacy. We are legitimate because we have borders, the rule of law, UN recognition, a historic right to the land... and because the western world sees us, in general, as legitimate."

Schneeweiss acknowledged that a resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would "absolutely buttress" Israel's legitimacy. "But the issue of the conflict is something we have to resolve on its own terms. The issue of our legitimacy is associated with the [peace process], but it's not inherent" in it, he said.

He added that without a functioning peace process, it's easier for those with an anti-Israel agenda to gain traction.

"I don't see that as any earth-shattering political insight," Schneeweiss said. "The existence of the conflict itself is not a problem of legitimacy."

Where does Abbas stand on 'right of return'?

Did he or didn't he? Did PA President Mahmoud Abbas, as some Palestinians charge, dare to renounce the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees and their descendants to Israel during a Nov. 1 interview on Israel's Channel 2?

At the beginning of November, when the media were fixated on the U.S. elections, then only days away, it was surprising to see just how much attention this interview received in the West – from the wires services and a great many major news outlets. Then again, this wasn't just any subject. As Jodi Rudoren, the New York Times' Jerusalem-based correspondent, observed, it's "perhaps the most intractable and emotional of all the unsettled issues" in the Israel-Palestinian conflict.

The focus of all the attention concerned Abbas' comment that even though he's a refugee from Safed, a town in northern Israel, he does not intend to return there one day as a resident but would only like to visit. "It's my right to see it, but not to live there," he said.

The reaction from the Palestinians was swift outrage including from elements of the PLO. Hamas denounced Abbas for his treasonous act, accusing him of trying to give up a "right" that is not his to renounce.

Asher Zeiger of The Times of Israel noted that Abbas' remark, "if applied to all Palestinian refugees and descendants [from the 1948 war], would represent a dramatic shift in Palestinian policy," which insists that refugees and their descendants, numbering more than five million according to the United Nations, have a "right of return" to present-day Israel. (Most Israeli legal scholars have long argued that there is no such "right" in international law.)

A chastened Abbas quickly declared that his comments had been taken out of context, reflected a personal view only, not policy, and he reaffirmed the "right of return" as a "sacred" trust.

This "correction" affects something else Abbas said during his Channel 2 interview: "Palestine for me is the 1967 borders with east Jerusalem as the capital. This is Palestine. I am a refugee. I live in Ramallah. The West Bank and Gaza is Palestine, everything else is Israel."

From the inception of the Oslo process in 1993, when, in his letter to then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, then PLO-chairman Yasser Arafat pledged to "recognize" Israel, there has been a consistent pattern of double-speak. Palestinian leaders, including the current PA president, have refused to recognize Israel as the state created by the UN as the Jewish state, since this would mean giving up their insistence on the "right of return" of Palestinians to Israel, thereby transforming it, eventually, into a majority Palestinian state.

Abbas himself has, time and again, insisted that the Palestinians have an inherent "right of return," even if, as reported during his 2008 Annapolis negotiations with then-Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, he agreed to greatly limit the number of Palestinians who would "return" over several years.

No Israeli leader could accept the principle of such a "right," even if the numbers were restricted to one period of time out of demographic concerns, since this principle could be invoked later to allow more Palestinians to "return."

In short, such an acceptance would be a Pandora's box.

Accordingly, Israeli negotiators speak in terms of permitting small numbers of Palestinians to come to Israel on an individual humanitarian basis as part of family reunification. It's not well known, but since 1948, more than 100,000 Palestinians have been allowed to take up residence in Israel on this basis.

The problem, however, is that the "right of return" has been given such prominence by Palestinian leaders for decades – including by those still living in refugee camps in Lebanon, Syria and Jordan – that it has achieved an inviolable status. No Palestinian leader can relinquish it without being considered a traitor to his people.

It's this factor – in view of other final status issues such as settlements, which are very difficult, but resolvable – that makes the Palestinian refugee matter so intractable indeed.

Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus a beacon for York Region

Membership for programs and services have already exceeded projections

By Talia Ferszt

Officially opened on October 14, 2012, the Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus is one of the most impressive community campuses in the world.

Spread across 50 acres on Bathurst Street north of Rutherford Road, Lebovic Campus is the culmination of years of dreaming, planning, fundraising and building that began with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's land purchase back in 2000, with the vision of providing integrated services and infrastructure for the York Region community.

The Campus is a place for everyone – young and old, of all affiliations, abilities and interests. It is a place of culture and education, recreation and wellness, celebration and integration, health and social services. Members of the surrounding community have been anticipating the effect it would have, not only to the physical landscape but particularly on their lives and their children's lives as Jews living north of Toronto.

The massive 400,000 square foot Campus includes the Kimel Family

The Schwartz/Reisman Centre located on the Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus

Education Centre - home to more than 600 students of TanenbaumCHAT High School; the Schwartz/Reisman Centre featuring the Phil Granovsky Sports & Recreation Pavilion; a Community Arts Centre; and the Gorman Shore

Goodman Childhood Education Centre. The Reena Community Residence was a welcome addition to the site, opening in September 2012 with 60 beautiful housing units for the developmentally disabled. Opening next on Campus is the Leo & Sala Goldhar Conference & Celebration Centre featuring the Shirley Auslander Hall, the Community Services Pavilion which will feature auxiliary community services and Mount Sinai's Sherman Health & Wellness Centre, housing family doctors, a WSIB back-to-work program, pain clinic, visiting specialists and a full range of allied health professionals.

The Jack & Pat Kay Centre Camp and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre daycare and preschool opened on Campus this past summer and fall respectively; both are already operating at higher than expected attendance. Gym and swim membership at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre has already exceeded projections. The Leo & Sala Goldhar Conference & Celebration Centre had celebrations booked even before the drywall was up. Lebovic Campus is proving itself to be a magnet for the community.

The Campus is more than just another place to exercise or swim; it is a place that will unite Jewish families, maintain Jewish interests and will quickly become a beacon for life north of Steeles Avenue.

Inside Autism By Silken Chan

She was restless. There were her hands, flapping like intermittent butterflies, a plastic fork in her grasp. She rubbed the fork furiously between her palms, rocking back and forth. And then my stepsister's long, unbridled shriek punctuated the restaurant's chatter. Every table went silent – but in that moment, autism spoke.

Autism spectrum disorders are a range of neurobiological conditions characterized by delayed social, cognitive, or communicative development. Modern psychiatry casts three disorders beneath the autism umbrella: "classic" autism, defined mostly by social deficits and impaired intelligence; high-functioning Asperger's syndrome; and pervasive developmental disorders not otherwise specified (PDD-NOS). First classified in the 1970s, ASD's integration into mainstream culture came in 1988, when Rain Man introduced Raymond Babbitt – an autistic savant whose mathematical prowess hid behind an array of obsessive behaviours. More recently, ASD has gained a poster-boy in physicist Sheldon Cooper on The Big Bang Theory. His eidetic memory and idiosyncrasies, reminiscent of Asperger's, have endeared him to the sitcom crowd – and cemented ASD in popular culture.

As much as these fictional autistics have promoted widespread awareness and acceptance of ASD in recent decades, theirs is a one-sided story. While it has been useful for autism to have these unofficial spokesmen, it hasn't necessarily been helpful or even particularly truthful. Pop culture has caricatured people with ASD as socially awkward geniuses, when in reality, only an estimated 0.5% to 10% display unusual skills like photographic memory.

Society champions cases like Babbitt's and Cooper's because they are ready-made success stories: the underdog's talents are hindered only by trouble communicating. Autistics are shown not as lonely but as lone wolves, not as struggling but as self-satisfied. Their coping-mechanism behaviours are reduced to charming quirks. Above all, the need endures to cast them as content and independent; if they are self-sufficient, then they need none of our support.

The truth is that those at the opposite end of the spectrum, who suffer from severe autism – as with my stepsister – may never learn to dress themselves, let alone perform astounding mental computation. Many live in group homes, where they receive round-the-clock care. Even moderate autism can keep an individual from a full-time job. Isolation, from inability to communicate and participate, is a lifelong side effect.

Autism, like light, is a spectrum: some of its disorders, in Asperger's ultraviolet or high-functioning infrared, often fall beneath the radar of visibility. Others, like the profound autism of my sister, are rainbow bursts wherever they go. As of now, there is no cure. My sister will continue to scream in public, to take food from other people, and to smile at strangers with unclouded radiance. She will not recite from memory the history of forks in Thailand, or help me win at blackjack.

And that is our challenge and our gift with people who are autistic: to learn to love what is there. To let who they are shine through the prism of who we want them to be, and to see them, with compassion, in all of their true colours.

Holocaust Education Week closing focuses on memory

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

A performance by the Artists of the Royal Conservatory (Arc), a highlight of the closing program of this year's Holocaust Education Week on Nov 8, was a clear reflection of the week's theme, "Reclaiming Memory."

The Toronto-based ARC is committed to the reclamation of forgotten or marginalized works by composers who were forced to flee Nazi Germany, part of a movement aimed at post-Shoah musical reparations and a cultural tikkun olam (repairing the world).

Led by music historian and artistic director Simon Wynberg, the ARC ensemble's concert at Beth Tzedec Congregation included conductor Mieczyslaw Weinberg's setting of Yiddish Holocaust poetry by Shmuel Halkin, and the Quintet for Piano and Strings by Szymon Laks, who survived Auschwitz-Birkenau and Dachau, composed his shortly after liberation. The third major work was an early Quartet for Piano and Strings by Paul Ben-Haim, regarded by many as one of the fathers of Israeli music, performed for the first time since 1932.

The concluding evening of Holocaust Education Week, presented by the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, was sponsored by the Royal Conservatory of Music and Beth Tzedec Sisterhood. It honoured Canadian veterans in recognition of Remembrance Day and welcomed visiting Israeli army veterans.

It also commemorated the 74th anniversary of Kristallnacht, Nov. 9, 1938, when the Nazis wreaked havoc in Germany and Austria, as synagogues were burned, shop windows smashed, businesses destroyed, stores looted, homes ransacked, families torn apart.

Memorial candles were lit by Holocaust survivors from the community: Gerda Frieberg, Yael Spier Cohen, Martin Maxwell, Inge Spitz, Al Gelfant, William (Bill) Rotman and their families.

Survivor Martin Maxwell, president of National Home Products Ltd., said, "It is up to the new generation, the future leaders of our community, to make sure there is no prejudice and to appreciate what we have."

Maxwell, now 88 and a decorated veteran who has just been awarded the Queen's Diamond Jubilee Medal for service, recalled how he and his brother were rounded up by Nazi SS officers, but were miraculously freed because of a "letter of passage" obtained from a German soldier who had employed his late brother at one time. Maxwell's two sisters died in a concentration camp.

"I am participating in the candlelighting ceremony in remembrance and honour of my sisters, Josephine and Ema Meisels, who died in Auschwitz, and for all the veterans I knew who died in the war. It has a double meaning for me," Maxwell said.

During the evening, attended by more than 900 people and many political and community dignitaries, the Israeli consul general in Toronto, DJ Schneeweiss, reflected on this year's theme.

"When I look at the issue of memory, I also like to think of the purpose of memory – why we remember. It is very deep in our tradition that we remember all the time, to learn the lessons in order to build a better society. We should always be able to prevent the extremes of violence and hatred," Schneeweiss said.

Remembrance requires action, rabbi says

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

The "never again" slogan has been lost on the world. It evolved into a wish, and is now, perhaps, simply a hope.

That was Rabbi Elie Karfunkel's opening message to an audience of mostly young adults at Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation on Nov. 6.

The evening, titled "Never Again. Really?," was dedicated to discussing why and how people should remember and commemorate those who died in the Holocaust.

It began with a video that asked people on the street what "never again" means to them. Some knew that it was related to the Holocaust, but many did not.

The consensus seemed to be that although the saying was intended to mean that another Holocaust, another genocide, would never happen, similar tragedies are still happening around the world.

Rabbi Karfunkel then took the podium to share his message of the importance of remembering not only the Holocaust, but also the many other times throughout history when Jews have been persecuted.

He compared the Jewish People to the main character in a movie – the only thing we are certain of when we watch a movie is the main character will be there at the end.

"I will be at the end of that movie because I'm part of the main character," he said. "We've beat all the odds."

He said it's important to recognize that the spirit of the Jewish people will never die, no matter how many attempts are made to destroy it.

"We are the stone, that when all is said and done, will be the most glorious stone," he said.

Holocaust survivor Vera Schiff also addressed the audience. She said remembering history is the key to making decisions about the future.

"We need to know where we are coming from in order to decide where we are at the present time and where we want to go in the future," she said.

It's especially important to remember the past given the number of Holocaust deniers in the world, she said.

"We need to accept that many threats are real," she added, explaining that she remembers European Jews denying that the Nazis intended to exterminate them until it was too late. Therefore, we have to stand up to challenge, she said.

Rabbi Joseph Oziel spoke to the audience via video, although he was also in attendance at the event. "Remembrance always revolves around actions," he said, as his main message.

He explained how each Jewish holiday remembers events of the past through action. For example, he said it would be impossible to remember the Exodus out of Egypt if not for the months of preparation cleaning our homes.

Rabbi Karfunkel then urged the audience to take six minutes a day to study Torah from a book, The Family Lesson a Day, which was distributed to each person. Each book was dedicated to a different child who died in the Holocaust.

He directed the audience to silently read a section on lashon hara, which explained the rules around listening to "false reports."

It's better to donate $1 per day for a year than $365 at once, Rabbi Karfunkel said, and the same logic should go for studying Torah.

"Let's do one thing two minutes a day," he said. "Ultimately, we know the biggest change we make will be inside ourselves."

The night concluded with a video interview with Mr. Good, a Holocaust survivor. He expressed his concerns that it won't be long before there are no more survivors to share their stories.

"We have a duty to speak about it in order to prevent it from ever happening again," he said.

But most of all, he added, Jews must listen, and then have children and grandchildren to pass on the story of the survivors and the Holocaust.

Cookbook speaks volumes: Miracles and Meals

By Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Most best-selling cookbooks become food-stained, but the pages of Miracles and Meals will become tear-stained as you read the 115 incredible stories of survivors from the horrors of the Holocaust. Each story is accompanied by treasured recipes that come from survivors all over the world.

Joanne and Harvey Caras were in Toronto in late April to launch Miracles and Meals, Volume 2 of The Holocaust Survivor Cookbook, at Uptown Chabad. Joanne's presentation was mesmerizing, bringing tears to the eyes of the audience as she shared some of the heart-wrenching stories submitted by Holocaust survivors and their families.

Joanne and Harvey have travelled to more than 150 cities around the world sharing their World Mitzvah project with thousands of men and women. The goal of the Caras family is to sell six million cookbooks worldwide. Profits from their first volume, The Holocaust Survivor Cookbook, have helped feed hundreds of poor people each day at the Carmel Ha'ir Soup Kitchen in Jerusalem.

'We want to make sure that our children and grandchildren hear the stories' salem. Their cookbooks have also earned three-quarters of a million dollars for groups that have used them as a fundraiser.

Joanne and Harvey became involved with the soup kitchen in 2005 when they went to Israel to spend time with their son Jonathan and his wife, Sarah, who were volunteers in the soup kitchen. Joanne was very impressed with the dignified way they treated their patrons. Those who cannot afford to pay do not. People who can afford to pay leave tzedakah at the door.

Joanne writes: "While the amazing survivor stories are the heart of both cookbooks, I can't overlook the wonderful recipes that we received. Most of them are old family recipes, and many would have been lost forever if the survivor had perished. Some of the recipes are very detailed in their ingredients and preparation instructions, others are not so much. Some tell us to put in 'a little of this and a little of that.' But the explanation of where the recipes came from and how they were passed down from generation to generation is priceless.

"We suggest that each time a recipe is served, someone at the table should also read the story out loud and show the photos that go with it. We want to make sure that our children and grandchildren hear the stories that come from these witnesses so they will never let this happen to our people again."

There are 115 new stories and 250 kosher recipes in Miracles and Meals. The recipes are organized by contributor, not by category, so you may find one page with a main dish and a dessert recipe side by side. There are also many Passover recipes. Instructions and ingredients are often vague, but the stories of survival from the contributors are explicit and memorable.

If you want to honour the memories of those who perished in the Holocaust and those who survived and rebuilt productive, positive lives, then you'll definitely want to purchase a copy for yourself and/or family members.

"Twenty-two souls of my immediate family perished: my parents, brothers, sisters, their spouses and eight nieces and nephews, including an infant born – still in the bunker under the ruins of the Warsaw Ghetto. Every Jew has a matzevah, a tombstone, a grave to go to. We have none. To us survivors, this was denied. I am one of the last generations of eyewitnesses. In the twilight of my days, I am pouring out the terrors of my life in the Warsaw Ghetto and in the death camps. But it has come to a time when we survivors must entrust our painful legacy to the youth – it is you who will carry our testimonies in the future and ensure that the voices of those who deny this atrocity are silenced." –Ella Blumenenthal, Cape Town, South Africa

Miracles and Meals is dedicated to the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust. For more information, visit www.survivorcookbook.org or contact Joanne Caras at 443-604-2643.

Several Canadians contributed their survival stories and recipes, including Frances Iskov, Sara Milbauer, Rachel Shetibel, Sophie Soil and Faye Schulman of

First Schulich Leader Scholarships awarded in Israel

Business leader, philanthropist, Seymour Schulich meets inaugural recipients

By Daniel Horowitz

When he launched the $100 million Schulich Leader Scholarship in October, 2011, aimed at encouraging Canadian and Israeli students to enroll in STEM subjects, Canadian business leader - and one of the world's most visionary philanthropists - Seymour Schulich made his motives clear. "I want to ensure that these two great nations - Canada and Israel - are at the forefront of excellence in science and research for generations to come," explained Schulich after kicking off the search for the Canadian scholarship recipients. "I look forward to these young people having the opportunity to explore, and ultimately benefit from a career in the sciences, technology, engineering or mathematics. I see this initiative as a real game-changer."

Mr. Schulich personally selected UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to be the administrator of the scholarship program. And, true to his words, after 40 Canadian Secondary School graduates were selected out of a pool of 977 high schools, Mr. Schulich launched the search for 20 Israeli recipients in January 2012.

And, earlier this month, along with Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and David Goodman, UJA Federation's Director, Schulich Leader Scholarships, Mr. Schulich traveled to Israel to personally recognize the Israeli students - selected in August - who will benefit from his generosity. Those selected represent five Israeli universities: Bar-Ilan University, Tel Aviv University, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Ben Gurion University of the Negev, and Technion - Israel Institute of Technology.

"You are the inaugural recipients of The Schulich Leader Awards in Israel," Mr. Schulich told the crowd. "You are unique as you were selected from close to 600 nominees. You join a group of 40 winners from Canada, who were selected from approximately 1,000 nominees. This award should carry you through your undergraduate years in one of the top five Israeli universities. You folks are very young and, therefore, rich in energy and time to expend on your passions in life. We are highly confident that many of you will make huge contributions to Israel and mankind."

Your (free) ticket to college

When you walk down the street, it doesn't take long to see people wearing white earbuds. You might assume they're listening to a hit song or a golden oldie. But there is a chance they're auditing a university course on Jewish mysticism, listening to a college lecture on the Torah or taking in a talk on surrealist artist Salvador Dali and Israel. Maybe they're attending iTunes U with its thousands of free lectures, many of which touch on Judaism and Jewish history.

If you'd like to "attend" iTunes U, you'll need to download iTunes, also free. [<http://bit.ly/itunesu1>] Then you can visit the iTunes U section and start browsing through the talks on practically any topic imaginable. [<http://bit.ly/itunesu20>] You can listen – and sometimes view – these lectures right on your computer and do not need to own an iPhone or iPod. But they are handy if you'd like to listen on the go.

The Jewish Theological Seminary certainly has breadth in its offerings. Topics include Nazi-looted Jewish Archives in Moscow and Jewish Mysticism in the Spiritual Life. Or how about something contemporary with What to Wear: Exploring Women's Clothing and its Relationship to Religion and Culture. Lecture 1: "From Jewish Jeans to Juicy JAPs: Clothing and Jewish Stereotype." [<http://bit.ly/itunesu3>]

More than half a century after he died, Albert Einstein continues to amaze and mystify. American Public Media's 12-part radio series, Einstein and the Mind of God, delves "into Einstein's Jewish identity, his passionate engagement around issues of war and race, and... Einstein's way of thinking about mystery, eternity and the mind of God." Almost three hours of radio documentaries and interviews about the genius are featured. [<http://bit.ly/itunesu4>]

The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum has 25 talks on a variety of topics including "Forced Labour in Nazi-Dominated Europe," "Voices on Antisemitism," and "Days of Remembrance," a speech by U.S. President Barack Obama. [<http://bit.ly/itunesu5>] You can also listen to 48 conversations with Holocaust survivors, including Rabbi Jacob Wiener on his arrest on Kristallnacht and Halina Peabody on her mother's decision to have Halina live as a Catholic during the war. [<http://bit.ly/itunesu6>]

Always wanted to attend Harvard? Now you can as you listen to Prof. Shaye J. D. Cohen's 26-part course, The Hebrew Scriptures in Judaism and Christianity. In addition to the audio, you can download lecture notes and even the exam questions. [<http://bit.ly/itunesu7>]

Here's an interesting find: A 29-part series produced by Emory University about Dali and his series of drawings, sketches and watercolour paintings titled, Aliyah: The Rebirth of Israel. [<http://bit.ly/itunesu8>] I suggest listening to the lectures while viewing Dali's works at the Emory website on the exhibition. [<http://bit.ly/itunesu9>]

New York's 92nd Street Y is known for the outstanding calibre of its arts programming and guest lecturers. The Y has created a massive mini-site at iTunes U featuring a wide variety of speakers, including the Jerusalem Post's Caroline Glick and business magnate

The Sephardi way is a rich one

I've recently been asked by members of my congregation to speak about the future of the Sephardi world. This question was prompted by an article written last summer by Rabbi Daniel Bouskila of the Sephardic Educational Center of Jerusalem and read recently at our minyan's Friday-morning breakfast.

The author writes movingly of his upbringing as a Sephardi Jew and how Sephardi Jews have historically been open-minded and tolerant, unlike what he perceives to be the current trend in Israel.

Rabbi Bouskila cites declarations of current Sephardi leaders, who have said that they "know" why certain natural disasters have occurred, as if they know what's on God's mind. Rabbi Bouskila says he's embarrassed by these leaders' "extreme" statements, which he seems to associate with the Ashkenazi (Lithuanian) world. He goes on to say that he won't relinquish his traditional, tolerant Sephardi outlook, which has nothing to do with the "extremism" of the current Sephardi leadership.

In order to consider this debate fairly, one must ask what it means to be Sephardi. Can we learn from the example of the Ashkenazi community? How can we make our tradition more relevant to the younger generation?

Historically, Sephardim have been tolerant and open-minded while being scrupulously faithful to tradition as conveyed on a daily basis by observance of richly woven customs.

We present a table open to all, but defined by centuries

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

of traditions and customs to which we jealously adhere. Our way is one of balance. We sift to glean what is consistent with our history, our tradition and our customs.

Clearly, we Sephardim have much to learn and to emulate with respect to the successes attained by our Ashkenazi brethren regarding education. We send our children to Ashkenazi-run schools, which we recognize as being at a very high level. It's not rocket science: the Ashkenazim have simply invested more time and more money in a sustained way than we have.

With respect to the relevance of our Sephardi culture to succeeding generations, nothing can substitute for the home environment – the many joys, the inevitable mistakes, the persistent opportunities for learning. Values are not what we say, but, rather, what we do. Our children watch us to see what's really important. Our synagogues, our schools, our camps, our rabbis, our teachers – all of these are important, but it's the home that establishes and transmits the relevance and the future of our Sephardi world.

Much has been said – or alluded to – concerning a perceived inferiority felt by Sephardim as compared with Ashkenazim. There are many historical reasons for this, but this is not the domain of this article. It's sufficient to say that the solution is simply to lead good Sephardi lives, as guided by our forebears and our teachers throughout the ages. After all, what we are living is not a test run. The Sephardi way has worked for two millennia! We are, indeed, on solid ground!

Let us help one another to realize the incalculable richness of the Sephardi way.

Lessons of community learned after Sandy

Sitting in our New York apartment as hurricane Sandy pounded the city, the wind tossed the trees outside and our windows rattled. Inside, we continued on. My daughter was fast asleep, my wife studied for an upcoming exam, and I conducted a telephone interview with only the occasional crackle on the line.

We were fortunate. Our power never went out. Our water kept running. Our apartment didn't flood. Meanwhile, millions of neighbours suffered.

For many, Sandy's legacy will be one of isolation. With no power or phone lines, Internet or elevators, with bridges closed, the subway crippled and a gas shortage, hundreds of thousands were left alone.

For me, and I'm sure for others, Sandy highlighted the importance of community, and specifically the strength of our Jewish community. The mobilization of individuals and agencies to support those most in need has made me appreciate the blessing of community.

As Sandy approached, our rabbi organized a calling list of the community's elderly. Before the storm we checked in with them to see if they had the supplies they needed, a safe place to wait out the storm and an emergency number to call. After the storm, we called to see if they had power, flooding or damage. While all those we called were relatively unscathed, their appreciation was palpable.

For days after the storm, messages were sent to Jewish email listserves and Facebook groups by relatives trying to locate their family. Without electricity to power elevators, working telephones or operating cell towers,

Class Act
Daniel Held

thousands of elderly were stranded in their apartments, unable to contact relatives or seek help. As emails came in with names and addresses, volunteers travelled to effected areas such as the Lower East Side to check on those stranded.

Over Shabbat our neighbourhood was full with evacuees. Families opened their homes and the synagogue organized meals. UJA Federation of New York collected more than 800 challahs to distribute, giving both physical and spiritual sustenance.

Countless communal organizations served as bases for relief efforts.

Jewish community centres opened their facilities to those who needed showers. Our synagogue offered outlets to recharge drained batteries, Internet access, and coffee to those without power. On the Sunday morning after the hurricane, the foyer was filled with donations from congregants and neighbours as we sorted the supplies and loaded cars delivering them to shelters.

The local Orthodox day school lost power. Synagogues – across denominations – set up makeshift classrooms, allowing students to continue their learning and parents to attend to more pressing issues of recovery.

The list of chesed, acts of kindness, that took place goes on and on. This is what communities do.

At times, it is easy to take our community for granted. We bicker among ourselves, argue over politics, Israel, religious practice, continuity, and colour schemes for the social hall. Seeing first-hand the response of our community to hurricane Sandy has, for me, reinforced the value of community to bring physical, emotional and spiritual support to those most in need.

That said, it shouldn't take a hurricane to get us to help each other across denominational, socioeconomic and political lines.

Canadians 'compelled to remember'

Lori Ransom
Special to The CJN

What if we invited Holocaust survivors and native Canadian residential school survivors to have a dialogue?

I remember when Len Rudner offered this suggestion just after our initial meeting. Len had responded to my call to the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs to learn about the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada and consider how we might work together to bring the story of residential schools and their legacy to other Canadians.

The event that grew out of that meeting took place Nov. 4 at the Native Canadian Centre of Toronto as part of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Holocaust Education Week. We heard voices from the Jewish and aboriginal communities who, together, asked what it meant to be a "survivor" or a "victim" and to have the responsibility of memory.

"I couldn't face remembering. My way of surviving was not to think about it," said Hedy Bohm, who survived Auschwitz-Birkenau.

"I remember the window where I cried for 10 years wanting to go home. I asked their God to send someone to help me in my hopelessness and fear... and no one came," said Geronimo Henry, a survivor of the Mohawk Institute Residential School.

Bohm and Henry are elders in their communities. During the program, Bohm said she honoured the title of elder conferred on those in the native community who have acquired great wisdom and the respect of their community. "There is more to a person than having survived something," she said.

While they spoke about the difficulty of remembering painful, dehumanizing experiences that sought to eradicate cultures and eliminate peoples, it is as elders now that they both find themselves "Compelled to Remember," as our dialogue was called. The education week's theme of culture of memory provided a safe space for the two peoples to compare their experiences and consider what they teach all of us.

Clayton Shirt, Karen Lasky and Jennifer Bolton reflected on the lasting impact these events had on children and grandchildren of survivors, who as Lasky said, could not help but feel different trying to grasp what their parents went through. Michael Slodovnick spoke of the value of creating places to share these stories such as at the Holocaust Museum where he works.

The resilience of the Jewish and indigenous peoples was evident. "It's about changing the dialogue so my own children know their identity," Bolton said.

Lasky commented: "As an adult, I had to find a way to forgive and to reconcile."

"I'm a human being, an Anishinaabe man, before anything else," Shirt offered. "My culture is one of the great wonders of the world. As are all the other cultures. I try to teach my children that."

Picking up a theme from Shirt, Bohm urged us to respond with goodwill as we move about the world and encounter other human beings, spirit-to-spirit, while, Henry added, seeking justice for ongoing human rights issues.

This compelling dialogue may be viewed at www.trc.ca. I hope our communities will continue their common journeys of remembrance together.

Israel Tennis Centers Foundation Shaping lifelong champions since 1976

For 36 years the Israel Tennis Centers have been promoting the social, psychological and physical development of Israeli youth through the medium of sport.

Using the game of tennis as a framework, just over 20,000 children participated last year in Israel Tennis Centers programs from Kiryat Shmona in the north to Beer Sheva in the south. Many of the 14 Israel Tennis Centers are located in economically challenged neighborhoods and outlying development towns.

Programs for Developmentally and Physically Challenged, Arab/Jewish Coexistence Doubles, Coexistence Kindergartens, and Ethiopian community programming are among the many ITC programs - all focused on tolerance, belief in one's self and the virtues of teamwork.

That the Israel Tennis Centers turn out world class Israeli tennis champions is a fortunate and exciting by-product. Every kid can be a champion in life.

Sex therapist debunks myths about Judaism

Aimee Harper
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Traditional sexual education needs to be more central in a Jewish upbringing because many people misunderstand its role in Judaism, said a sex therapist at Ottawa's Limmud Festival on Nov. 4.

At Congregation Beth Shalom's second Limmud Festival, which took place Nov. 3 and 4, Peggy Kleinplatz, a clinical psychologist, sex therapist and professor at the University of Ottawa, concluded the festival of Jewish learning and culture with an interactive lecture based on her 2007 article, The Hole in the Sheet and other Myths about Sexuality and Judaism.

To an audience of about 60 people of a range of ages, Kleinplatz emphasized the sex-positivity of Judaism, which is based on consent, and historically "a husband's responsibility [and] a wife's privilege."

"How come everybody knows about the don'ts and nobody knows about the dos? Why do so many people know about the prohibitions and so few people know about the obligation for pleasure in Halachah?"

Many Jews and gentiles believe that Jewish people are supposed to have sex through a hole in a sheet, but according to Halachah, Kleinplatz said, "not only are you not allowed to have sex through a hole in the sheet, you're not allowed to have anything between you," including condoms.

"It is considered an act of such holiness that there can be nothing that gets between the sheer physical delight of skin-to-skin contact," she said.

Prejudicial and prevailing ideas about sexuality and Jews "[are] based on ignorance," Kleinplatz said. The Holocaust changed sexual education traditions because generations of people who taught it were killed, and their message couldn't be passed to today's Jews.

These ideas have been perpetuated "because it's a good way of keeping [Jews] 'other,'" Kleinplatz said.

North America's culture is sex-negative, Kleinplatz said. "There is constant talk about sex, but not in intimate relations."

Kleinplatz recounted a story of a student in her human sexuality class, who spoke up on the first day of class while she was teaching them the history of sexuality in Judaism, and said, "Excuse me Prof. Kleinplatz, you're obviously mistaken... I personally know many Orthodox Jews, and none of them like sex."

Kleinplatz likened the sacrality and importance of sexuality in Judaism to the Torah. "The things that Judaism prizes as most holy, as most sacred, are the ones you're least likely to see thrown about casually, but that doesn't mean that Judaism rejects sexuality, merely that it's covered, so as to keep it safe."

Sex is as close as you can get to knowing God, Kleinplatz said, so it's important for young people to learn about it.

Jenny Roberge, an organizer of the Ottawa Limmud Festival, said that with the recent revolution of women studying the Talmud, the opportunity for everyone to discuss traditions and myths has opened up. Limmud brings Jews from different streams together in discussion, she said.

"Limmud is the only tent that can bring all these variations of Jews together under one tent."

Roberge said that Rabbi Scott Rosenberg of the Congregation Beth Shalom supports such a project "to expose issues that people have a limited access to."

Bringing Kleinplatz in for a lecture about sex, normally a taboo subject, is a key part of Limmud, which allows for a "broad spectrum" of learning, and is available for everyone, free of charge, said Roberge.

Roberge said she "[sees] Peggy as a real heroine" in this revolution involving women closely studying the Talmud.

"We need to go back to our roots. We need to return to our traditions where there is nothing more important than how we treat each other," Kleinplatz said.

Jewish teens compete to raise funds for charity

Americans weren't the only ones voting on Nov. 6. Torontonians at the Jewish Youth Network's (JYN) fourth annual gala benefit were voting for a team of high school students competing with other teams to raise funds for the charity of their choice at the first-ever JYN DEN competition.

Based on the popular Canadian TV show Dragons' Den, where entrepreneurs pitch business proposals to a panel of judges to secure funding for their company, the students had to convince a panel of judges and a roomful of 250 people why their charity deserved the funds that would be raised from the evening's auctions.

"It's a new trendsetter for these types of galas and events," said Rabbi Shmuli Nachlas, who founded JYN with his wife, Chani, in 2008. "This is just the beginning. We have so many more programs we hope to launch in the future."

The four student teams were made up of leaders in JYN's Teens for the Community program, in which youth volunteers plan programs to help the sick, the elderly or anyone in need.

"We've had a basketball tournament for physically disabled kids, we've packed lunches for the homeless," Rabbi Nachlas said. "The kids love it."

Through educational classes, charitable programs and extracurricular activities, JYN has engaged with hundreds of high school kids across the GTA.

"It started with seven students around my kitchen table three years ago, and it just took off like wildfire," Rabbi Nachlas said. "It gives kids the opportunity to do chesed in a meaningful way and actually be the ones at the forefront doing it."

While the groups all chose worthwhile charities — one team wanted to raise funds to help the homeless, another wanted to help children with cancer to pay for medical costs, and team IDF wanted to provide basic resources that aren't covered by the Israeli government for an army unit where a Toronto native and former Teens for the Community president now serves.

After the teams presented their videos, the audience voted for the winner by using their smartphones, and the results were uploaded live on wide screens.

"Tonight, we vote not for Romney or Obama, but for the greatest community service initiative here tonight," Rabbi Nachlas told the crowd.

Team Aaron's Apple won the competition, raising funds for the charity founded by Aaron Maresky and his mother, Mandy, after Aaron was diagnosed with Crohn's disease at age seven. It helps families pay for medical treatments for children with chronic illnesses that are not covered by the government.

"Before Aaron's Apple, I used to donate my allowance to the hospital, but then I realized I could start my own charity," Aaron explained on a video. "I turned my negative into a positive."

For these Jewish youths, the passion they develop for helping others doesn't disappear when they leave high school.

JYN boasts an impressive alumni base, many of whom return for alumni programs, including last year's sold-out Shabbat dinner.

Two Thornhill leaders and JYN alumni were presented with awards at the recent gala. Galor Perez received the Young Leadership Award while Aaron Schacter, president and CEO of Bounce Entertainment Inc., received the Young Business Award.

"Business is a ruthless world, but JYN keeps my mind close to Jewish values and always guides me to make the right decisions," Schacter said.

If the first few years have been any indication, JYN is on the path to success. "It's meaningful, it's fun and they're all doing it with their friends," said Rabbi Nachlas. "That's the beauty of it."

Former solicitor general 'made a big difference'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Robert Kaplan, Canada's solicitor general from 1980 to 1984, died Nov. 5 of cancer. He was 75.

Kaplan brought in Canada's Young Offenders Act (the precursor of today's juvenile justice system), created the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), and was responsible for Canada's role in the prosecution of war criminals.

A native of Toronto who graduated from Forest Hill Collegiate Institute and the University of Toronto, Kaplan was a lawyer who became Canada's youngest MP in 1968, representing the Don Valley riding at age 32.

A devoted Liberal, he was re-elected in 1972 and in five succeeding consecutive elections, representing York Centre until his retirement from politics in 1993.

Kaplan was inspired to enter politics by Pierre Trudeau, who, as a University of Montreal professor before he became Canada's prime minister, led a research trip to the newly independent Republic of Ghana. Kaplan participated in the trip on a scholarship.

As a university student, Kaplan served as a guide at the Canadian Pavilion at the World's Fair in Brussels in 1956, an experience related to his love of international affairs and of languages – he eventually spoke seven.

Rabbi Elie Karfunkel, who officiated at Kaplan's standing-room-only funeral Nov. 6 at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, remembers him as "a brilliant man" who was genuinely modest, despite numerous honours and awards, and as someone who focused on getting things done.

The rabbi got to know Kaplan through Kaplan's son John's involvement in his synagogue, the Temmy Latner Forest Hill Jewish Centre (FHJC).

"Bob Kaplan was intimately involved in everything his kids care about," he said. Rabbi Karfunkel said that Kaplan became a father figure to him as well, and that he used to ask him for advice.

At the shul's groundbreaking last year, Robert Kaplan spoke of the antisemitism he experienced as a child and his pride in his uncles who were soldiers during the war.

Kaplan's daughter Jennifer Chown said in a eulogy that her father loved Canada more than anyone she ever met. "He submitted all of himself to changing her for the better... He always believed in the wealth provided by other cultures and peoples."

Although Kaplan was not religious, he "was so proud of being Jewish," Chown told The C/N.

Among the causes he was involved in, Kaplan was an advocate for Soviet Jewry. In his early days as an MP he and his wife Estherleke visited the Soviet Union to try to convince the Soviets to allow Jews to come to Canada at the Jewish community's expense, Chown said.

Pursuing Nazi war criminals was also a passion of his, she said.

Political analyst and television personality Stephen LeDrew, who spent three years as Kaplan's chief of staff when Kaplan was solicitor general, said Kaplan was disheartened by then-justice minister Jean Chrétien's unwillingness to pursue the matter.

However, LeDrew said, he recalls Kaplan saying, "If Canada's not going to do anything, I know Germany has a law on the books. We'll extradite them."

Kaplan "made a big difference," LeDrew said, adding that the then-solicitor general also organized the first conference for victims of crime.

"I was very privileged to be able to work with Bob... a very intelligent, decent, hard-working, wonderful, generous man. Irwin Cotler, MP for Mount Royal, told The C/N that Kaplan was "a very decent guy, personable, friendly, accessible, easy to work with, and I think that's why he was able to get things done that somebody else might not have succeeded at."

He added that the establishment of CSIS took "a lot of guts" on Kaplan's part.

After his retirement from politics, Kaplan became involved in international business, most notably as a founder of PetroKazakhstan Inc.

Kaplan leaves his children Jennifer Mia Chown, John David, and Raquel Katherine Shulman, as well as 12 grandchildren, and his brother Michael. He was predeceased by his wife of 47 years, Estherleke, in 2009.

'It was a little scary'

Many of the students were stuck in places without power.

"It was hard to get in touch with them because once their phone died, they couldn't charge it anywhere," Gasner said. She stayed in the Washington Heights area, which never lost electricity, but she said it was nerve-racking to watch the news and to see all the trees that had toppled over.

Talia Schwartz stayed in the Riverdale area of the city with her friend. They lost power, but she was able to charge her cellphone and keep warm during the day at her friend's sister's apartment.

"It was a little scary, but it was freezing at night," said Schwartz, who is a Grade 11 student at Ulpanat Orot Girls School. Wednesday came and went, and the group was still stuck in the city. The flight was cancelled and the bus station was closed, Gasner said. "They rebooked us for Thursday afternoon, but the flight agent who was helping us told us there was a good chance we wouldn't be home until the weekend."

Gasner's mother, Ellise, ended up saving the day with her 12-seater van. The Yachad office arranged to have the group driven to Scranton, Penn., where Gasner and her friend, Ali Rizvi, picked them up.

"It rained the entire 15 hours," she said. "I was thinking there was a cloud over my car."

But despite the trouble getting home – they headed home on Nov. 1 – she said the group was pretty fortunate in their situation.

"Considering all the devastation, we're very lucky," she said.

Victoria synagogue holds auction to save its roof

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — With the roof of Canada's oldest synagogue cracking and crumbling before their eyes, members of Victoria's Congregation Emanu-El knew they had to do something to save the national heritage site as it approached its 150th anniversary next June.

They planned an auction and started writing letters, appealing to 500 celebrities, as well as artists, restaurateurs, hoteliers and others to help save the synagogue.

The results have been overwhelming, and the congregation's board has accumulated more than 100 items for its Nov. 22 auction, dubbed "Help the Fiddler Fix the Roof," which they hope will raise $25,000.

Leonard Cohen offered one of his signed prints with a certificate of authenticity. The work, the first in a series of 50 prints by Cohen, would sell for up to $4,000 unframed in a gallery, according to shul vice-president Jean Dragushan.

Vancouver Island artists Robert Amos, Robert Bateman and Phyllis Serota offered their artwork, while authors Margaret Atwood and David Suzuki provided books, and Heather Ogden, prima ballerina with Canada's National Ballet, sent a signed pair of her pointe shoes.

Other collectibles include a Morley Safer autographed baseball cap, two signed self-portraits by Chaim Topol and an Inuit carving by Napatchie Ashoona, all the way from Nunavut.

The goal of the overall fundraising campaign to repair the shul is $950,000, according to board co-chair Michael Bloomfield.

"The roof has to be structurally repaired, which will probably cost $350,000, but it's done some damage to the heritage window frames and stained glass windows, which need to be upgraded, as they are paper thin," he said. Other initiatives to bring the shul up to date include upgrades to security and accessibility.

To date, through fundraising in the local community over the past year, the board has raised $275,000 in a process Bloomfield describes as "tough."

"Times are tough, people are a little less able and there's a big gap to fill, but step by step, we're getting there."

The board is also pursuing grant applications to all levels of government and seeking funds from individual donors and foundations.

"The city grants look promising, though with the provincial grants, it's hard to know. We also have a number of proposals in with the federal government," he said. "We just have to pull it off."

The auction's $25,000 goal is relatively small in the context of the larger campaign, but the board hopes it will raise community awareness about the project.

"This synagogue has always been of interest to the wider community in Victoria," Dragushan says.

In 1863, when the synagogue was built, the congregation had to come up with money to buy the land itself. While Christian churches got their start with government land grants, the synagogue was not eligible. Learning of this unequal treatment, Victorians of many faiths pitched in to assist the handful of local Jews with construction costs.

Tickets to the auction, to be held at Victoria's DaVinci Centre, cost $50 and include food and beverages. To buy tickets, visit www.congregationemanu-el.ca.

Tarbut Festival returns

Myron Love

Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This community's third annual Tarbut: Festival of Jewish Culture, from Nov. 17 to 25, presents an assortment of musical groups, authors and never-seen-before films.

"We are thrilled with the quality of the performers and authors we have coming in," says Tamar Barr, the programming director for the Rady Jewish Community Centre, which organizes the event. "We had over 3,000 people come out last year, and we are expecting more this year."

Tarbut evolved from the long-standing Jewish Book Fair at the Asper Jewish Community Campus. Two years ago, the Rady JCC, which had long been charged with organizing the weeklong Jewish Book Fair, decided to change the format of the yearly event. Authors are still featured and many books and Jewish crafts are on display, but the program has been expanded with concerts, comedy, movies and visual art.

This year's art show, which includes the works of Shoshana Shalev-Minuk, Elena El, the late Caroline Dukes and the late Leonard Marcoe, opens on Nov. 17 and runs all week, culminating in a discussion on Nov. 25 on what constitutes Jewish art.

Last year, Tarbut concluded with a tribute to Marcoe, who died earlier this year. Marcoe was not only an artist but also a mentor to other artists and a patron of the arts through his long-running Leonard Marcoe Studio Gallery.

This year's Tarbut program kicks off on the Saturday evening with a performance by comedian Rachel Feinstein, a finalist on the TV show Last Comic Standing (season 7). Feinstein has had her own half-hour TV comedy special and is a headliner at comedy clubs, festivals and colleges across North America.

On Nov. 18, author David Bezmozgis will be reading from his latest book, The Free World, winner of the Amazon.com First Novel Award, the Canadian Jewish Book Award for Fiction and a finalist for several top Canadian literary awards.

In the evening, Hava Nagila, a documentary about the origins of the popular song and its journey from its birth in eastern Europe, will be screened.

On Nov. 19, the featured performers will be the Hadar

Comedian Rachel Feinstein

Writer David Bezmozgis

Noiberg Trio. Noiberg is an Israeli jazz flutist who gives jazz a Middle Eastern sound.

Yemen Blues plays on Nov. 20. An Israeli sextet whose mix of Arabic and Hebrew music captures the influences of Yemeni, West African and American jazz, blues and funk. Yemen Blues is currently on a North American tour with Winnipeg the only Canadian stop.

A Polish film titled Little Rose, about a woman in late 1960s Poland who is recruited by the secret police to discredit a Jewish professor during the Communist government's campaign to silence dissent, will be screened on Nov. 21.

"Fiddler in the Golden Land" is on the menu for Nov. 22. The program is an evening of musical entertainment and nostalgic memories of the old Jewish North End, the home of most of Winnipeg's Jewish population until the 1950s. Sandi Krawchenko Altner will read from her novel Ravenscraig, which takes place in the old North End.

In keeping with a tradition of special tribute evenings to Jewish songwriters, Tarbut is highlighting the music of Paul Simon on Nov. 17 and 24. (Last year, the festival featured a tribute to Bob Dylan.) The musicians will be lead by local pianist, composer and producer Glen Buhir.

Tarbut ends with a "Rockin' Chanukah Concert" featuring top Jewish children's performer Rick Recht, performing songs from his PJ Library children's album, Look at Me, and his recently released album, Simply Shabbat.

Abbas spurns Obama's plea to avoid UN bid

The Times of Israel

RAMALLAH — A spokesperson for Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas says the Palestinians will proceed with asking the UN General Assembly to recognize a Palestinian state, despite a personal call from U.S. President Barack Obama to abandon the bid.

Nabil Abu Rudeineh said Abbas had a long phone conversation with Obama Sunday evening.

According to Rudeineh, the U.S. president "expresses his opposition to this step," but Abbas replied that he would carry on.

In Washington, the White House press office said that Obama "reiterated the United States' opposition to unilateral efforts at the United Nations."

Obama also "reaffirmed his commitment to Middle East peace and his strong support for direct negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians" for a peace accord, the White House said.

the Palestinian status at the world body to non-member observer state.

The two countries say a Palestinian state can be established only through negotiations. Israeli-Palestinian talks broke down four years ago, and the Palestinians refuse to renew them until Israel agrees to halt all settlement construction, which Jerusalem has refused to do.

Earlier Sunday, Abbas reiterated his intention to proceed with a UN bid in November.

"Some powers are trying to tell us that the two-state solution doesn't come from the UN but through negotiations," Abbas said Sunday, speaking at a memorial ceremony for former Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat. "Negotiations are crucial. But to get UN recognition is also key."

He added, "We will turn to the United Nations, even though they do not want us to do this... We do not want to deny the legitimacy of Israel, only the legitimacy of the settlements."

IT TAKES DAILY COURAGE TO CONTINUE ...

When the Second Lebanon War broke out, Dror Kendelstein immediately responded to the call. This was not his first time in the army. He had previously been in many life-threatening situations, especially in Gaza. He was proud to protect Israel.

In August, 2006, Dror's platoon was in the outskirts of Bint Jbeil, surrounded by enemies. They were to clear the terrain for the heavy engineering corps vehicles.

"Many hours passed, and then I vaguely remember falling back, everything went blank. A bullet had penetrated through my forehead."

Dror's life was suddenly changed forever. For seven long months Dror was unconscious. Finally, the doctors

"I vaguely remember falling back, everything went blank. A bullet had penetrated through my forehead."

determined that his brain was in distress and that a drainage tube had to be inserted if he was ever going to wake up. It was a very risky procedure, but thankfully successful.

When Dror awoke he remembered what had happened. Unfortunately he also found out that his world was shattered. He was a quadriplegic who suffered epileptic seizures and had a speech impediment.

Dror was heartbroken and angry, but he was also determined. Dror had to start from zero. He had to re-learn everything, including how to talk and eat.

Every day Dror travels 45 minutes each way to the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv. The physiotherapy and occupational therapy he receives are often agonizing but Dror perseveres, never giving in to the pain. At Beit Halochem he plays table tennis to sharpen his skills and also receives computer training.

Dror passionately wants his independence, and at Beit Halochem we are determined to assist him in reaching his goal. Our broad array of therapies and services provide state-of-the-art rehabilitative treatment for wounded veterans, like Dror.

Beit Halochem is committed to helping Dror and the other 51,000 disabled members receive the help that they so urgently need and deserve.

Dror was one of the most severely wounded Israelis during the Second Lebanon War.

'Genocidal' Sudan elected to key UN council

Compiled by CJN Staff

NEW YORK — Sudan has been elected to a seat on the United Nations Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC), receiving 176 votes in favour out of 192 cast, more than the United States.

Sudan was part of a group of five African countries nominated to the post by the Africa group at the UN.

UN Watch, a Geneva-based non-governmental human rights group, called on UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Navi Pillay, U.S. Ambassador to the UN Susan Rice and the EU's foreign policy chief Catherine Ashton to condemn the election of "genocidal, misogynistic and repressive" Sudan to the 54-member council.

"It's an outrage," said Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch. "Electing genocidal Sudan to a global human rights body is like choosing Jack the Ripper to guard a women's shelter. This diminishes the credibility of the United Nations human rights system and casts a shadow upon the reputation of the organization as a whole."

ECOSOC is tasked with regulating human rights group. It also shapes the composition of key UN women's rights bodies and adopts resolutions on issues from Internet freedom to female genital mutilation.

Sudan, whose leader was indicted by the International Criminal Court for genocide and crimes against humanity, will now help choose the members of the Commission on the Status of Women, the executive of UN Women, and UNICEF, which protects children's rights, Neuer said.

"There is no question that Sudan will be a malign influence. This is a terrible decision — and world leaders, who failed to prevent it, must at least now speak out for basic decency and morality in UN bodies," he said.

Syria fighting spills into Golan

In addition, Israel filed an official complaint with the UN observer forces stationed along the demilitarized zone between Israel and Syria, and warned against further fire from inside Syria.

On Sunday morning, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel was "closely monitoring what is happening on our border with Syria and... we are ready for any development."

Last week, three mortar shells from Syria fell in and around Moshav Alonei Habashan in the Golan, but caused no damage or injuries. The IDF has been kept on high alert since Nov. 3, when three Syrian tanks strayed into the demilitarized zone separating the two borders, leading Israel to lodge an official complaint with UN peacekeepers stationed in the demilitarized zone.

In September, a number of mortar shells fired by regime forces landed in the north of the Golan Heights, and in another incident, Syrian soldiers entered the demilitarized zone.

Meanwhile, rockets fired from Gaza continued to hit southern Israel for a third day on Monday, despite Egyptian officials' attempts to mediate a ceasefire.

One of the rockets, of the more than 110 that have struck Israel's south since last Saturday night, landed in the yard of a home in Netivot on Monday, damaging the home and two neighbouring homes, and leaving 20 people requiring treatment for shock. Two rockets fired at the major Israeli city of Ashkelon were intercepted by the Iron Dome anti-missile system on Monday morning. A rocket fired Sunday evening hit a home in Sderot.

Three rockets hit Israel Sunday night. Israel's military retaliated with attacks on what it called, in a statement, a terror tunnel and a weapon-storage facility in the northern Gaza Strip, as well as a launching site in the southern Gaza Strip. Direct hits were confirmed, according to the military. Five more rockets were fired at Israel on Monday morning. At least six Palestinians reportedly have been killed in retaliatory Israeli airstrikes on what the IDF called "terror-activity sites."

The rocket fire began Saturday night and continued throughout Sunday. A factory in Sderot was hit Sunday morning, and several buildings and two cars in the Sha'ar Hanegev municipality also were damaged in attacks.

UJA Federation is Everywhere

With over 100 partner agencies and schools, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's reach is farther than you might realize.

Every year on Remembrance Day, we honour the brave Jewish men and women who proudly served in the Canadian Armed Forces so that future generations could live in freedom. Paying homage to our fallen soldiers, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto erected a monument — located on Sherman Campus — on Bathurst Street just north of Sheppard Avenue — listing the names of 570 Jewish men and women who fought and died during the wars of the 20th century.

Initiated by the committee of Jewish War Veterans (Amek Adler, Everett Blustein and Mike Brown), the eight-foot-long black marble monument includes an inscription from Laurence Binyon's Poem for the Fallen: "At the going down of the sun and in the morning, we will remember them." Now, every day is cause for remembrance, as we pay tribute to those who gave their lives for our community.

Affiliation of Jewish youth top of GA agenda

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

BALTIMORE — Many in the organized Jewish community believe that young Jews with no religious affiliation don't care about being Jewish, but it's not that simple, Rabbi Rick Jacobs, president of the Union for Reform Judaism, said Sunday at the 81st general assembly (GA) of Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) in Baltimore.

"Some don't care at all, but others do care, even deeply, about their Jewish identity and spirituality," he told an audience of more than 3,000 delegates at the opening plenary. "But Jews in their 20s and 30s are hungry for meaning and purpose in their lives. And too many of them assume that they will not find what they are seeking in the organized Jewish world."

"Tikkun olam is the pathway for most young Jews to live a life of Jewish commitment," Rabbi Jacobs said. He lauded federations and synagogues for being "prepared at a moment's notice" to feed, clothe and shelter countless people in the wake of Hurricane Sandy.

Such work "can surely inspire the wider Jewish world to join this work of fixing the brokenness in our world," said the rabbi, who was scholar-in-residence for the three-day event.

The recent hurricane highlights the way the federation system responds to emergencies, Genine Fidler, GA co-chair with Linda Hurwitz, said. "No less than two weeks ago Jewish federations through JFNA raised more than $1 million to help victims of Hurricane Sandy."

The JFNA, which represents 155 Jewish federations and 400 non-federated "network" communities, distributes more than $1 billion annually for social services and educational needs locally and overseas.

Jerry Levin, president of UJA-Federation of New York, thanked JFNA for its allocation of funds in the immediate wake of the hurricane, when cash was needed.

Kathy Manning, chair of JFNA's board of trustees, said that after becoming involved in federation work more than 20 years ago, she realized that she had become part of something "much larger than myself, and much larger than my community."

She also spoke about the next generation, noting that some people say the federation system is "an old model that won't survive, because today's donors are more independent, less connected to Israel, and less connected to the Jewish community."

But Manning doesn't believe it, she said. "I've seen how Jews of all ages find meaning in the work we do together as a community."

David Gergen, CNN senior political analyst, said the recent U.S. election should remind everyone, not just those in politics, that it's time "to understand we have to be part of a more diverse society in which we listen to more alternative voices... We don't have to leave the table, but we have to make a bigger table."

On a larger scale, he said that recently re-elected U.S. President Barack Obama sees the United States' relationship with China as "the most important bilateral issue in the world." Gergen added that Obama and his team would "basically like to reduce the amount of engagement and time they spend on the Middle East."

However, he said, they realize they can't do that because too much is at stake in the Middle East. Gergen cited the Israeli-Palestinian issue, the Muslim Brotherhood, the Arab Spring, and — above all, the "one issue that could explode in the next 24 months" — the United States' relationship with Iran.

There is "a serious possibility we could have a serious crisis in Israeli-U.S. relations," Gergen said. "I think what's most important in the next few months is to open a new chapter in U.S.-Israeli relations."

Gergen, a Protestant who said he was at the GA as "a friend of Israel and the Jewish community," traces his views in part to a trip to the Middle East when he worked in the White House during Richard Nixon's presidency, and also to his daughter's conversion to Judaism.

Following the plenary, Toronto physician Elyse Lackie, JFNA's chair of national young leadership, echoed some of the concerns expressed at the opening event. She told The CJN, "We've got to become more relevant to the next generation [by] meeting Jews where they're at."

Allen Chankowski, a father of two day school students, became involved in federation about 18 months ago. He said that Lackie is introducing him to the world of Jewish leadership at the GA. "I understand what Jewish education does for the community. I'm here to further my own understanding of that."

Adam Singer, president of the Calgary Jewish Federation, said he hoped he would bring back new ideas and "the sense of our community's connection to a very vibrant Jewish world... There are good reasons for us to be optimistic about the next generation's engagement, and we have to recognize that they are going to engage in ways that are going to look different from our generation, and we have to be ready to embrace that."

Wiesel says he and Obama are writing a book

JTA

NEWYORK — Elie Wiesel and U.S. President Barack Obama are writing a book together, the Holocaust survivor and author told an Israeli newspaper.

The book, which the two men will resume writing now that the presidential election is over, is "a book of two friends," Wiesel, a Nobel laureate, told Ha'aretz.

Ha'aretz reported that Wiesel, 84, and Obama became friends in 2009 when Wiesel joined Obama on a visit to the site of the Buchenwald concentration camp, where Wiesel was interned at the end of World War II following a death march from Auschwitz.

"We talk about philosophy, contemplation, thought, but never about politics. He is a thinking person, a person with depth and intellectual curiosity," Wiesel said about the dinners that the two occasionally have together. Wiesel and Obama first met when Wiesel lectured at California's Occidental College, where Obama was a student.

"Your lecture has stayed with me to this day," the president told Wiesel years later, Wiesel told Ha'aretz.

"When I heard that, my pulse went up," Wiesel said. "I told myself that I have to be careful, because I can never know whether anyone in the audience will be a future president."

ReKinect allows families to stay in touch

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

As head of a startup, David Axelrad is having a hard time convincing the people he needs to convince – his customers – that they really could use his product.

Maybe it's because it's not a simple retail good, like soap or CDs, but a system that allows the families of dementia patients to stay in contact with their stricken relatives even if they're not there. Since most prospective users of the system reside in nursing homes and long-term care facilities, Axelrad has the challenge of convincing both the institutions and the families to buy into his product.

Axelrad, along with brother, Rob, a computer maven, have put together a system that piggybacks on the Skype video conferencing tool and allows the children of dementia patients to call in and launch a video and audio connection with their folks, even if their parents don't have the wherewithal to even pick up a phone.

"The service can be used in private homes as well as long-term care facilities or even rehab hospitals," said Axelrad.

Video-conferencing over Skype or other software solutions is nothing new, but he and Rob have modified it so that neither the patient, nor nurses or caregivers have to answer the call. In this way, the family retains control, and staff at the institutions are not taken away from their other tasks, Axelrad said.

Axelrad has launched a company, aptly named ReKinect, that places a high definition monitor with speakers, an unobtrusive computer and an Internet camera in a family member's room, whether in a seniors home or in their own dwelling. When someone calls in, the system launches automatically and the family member can then call their parent to the screen and have a conversation with them, he said.

It also permits family members to see if there have been any changes to their loved one, whether it's a bump or bruise, or whether they appear particularly disoriented. It provides peace of mind for those who cannot always get away for a personal visit, he added.

David Axelrad

At a projected cost to the families of $49.95 a month, Axelrad is also considering bundling it with some other service, such as movies on demand that can be booked remotely. Right now the system "really is at an embryonic stage with a handful of people" who have come on board, Axelrad said.

But with Canada's increasingly aging population and 540,000 families with loved ones in long-term care, there's clearly a market for the product.

Axelrad came up with the idea when observing his father, Arthur's, situation. A former leukemia cancer research scientist and professor at the University of Toronto, Arthur now suffers from Alzheimer's disease.

He resides in a long-term care facility where his basic daily needs are met, such as meals, medication and nursing care. Yet Arthur collapsed alone in his room receiving facial bruises and blows to the head. His father was unable to answer phone calls or initiate a call so Arthur and Rob came up with a solution. They placed a monitor in his room connected to the Internet; when someone from the family calls in, the image pops up on the screen in full HD, along with the high quality sound, which assists those like Arthur who are hard of hearing.

Timing of the calls take into account Arthur's daily routine.

Barbara Axelrad, Arthur's wife, said "I can call my husband in the morning, see he's all right and get on with my day without worrying how he's doing before I see him again later that day. And if I'm sick or he is and we can't get together, at least we can stay connected.

That's really something quite special."

A variation of the system now being developed would permit more able patients to initiate a call by simply touching an image of a loved one on the screen.

It also permits family members to consult with doctors and caregivers over the network – a solution that is not quite a personal visit but better than a phone call, Axelrad said.

Chabon's latest brims with references to pop culture

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Not surprisingly, American author Michael Chabon originally developed the premise, story and characters for his latest novel, Telegraph Avenue (HarperCollins), as the script for a 1999 television pilot that never got off the ground.

Like many of his previous books, including his 2000 Pulitzer Prize-winning novel The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier & Clay, Telegraph Avenue is brimming with references to popular television shows, movies, records, science fiction classics, comic book heroes and other pop-culture legends. (His other books include The Yiddish Policemen's Union, Gentlemen of the Road and Manhood for Amateurs.)

It also offers an ambitious ensemble of characters including full portraits of women as well as men, blacks and Jews, gays, old folks, teenagers and babies, and "blaxploitation" stars of the 1970s. The mix also contains a variety of thugs and criminals as well as people of much higher station such as Gibson Goode, an ex-football quarterback who has become the fourth-richest black man in America, and U.S. President Barack Obama, who makes a thematically appropriate cameo.

The setting is the racially mixed city of Oakland, Calif. Archy Stallings, who is black, and Nat Jaffe, who is Jewish, share a passion for vintage jazz and pop music and thus find themselves among that "league of solitary men united in their pursuit of the lost glories of a vanished world." Archy and Nat are partners in Brokeland Records, a store that its owners realize is "nearly the last of its kind, Ishi. Chingachgook. Martha the passenger pigeon" – and now thoroughly endangered because the tycoon Gibson Goode intends to open a rival megastore in the hood.

Their wives, Gwen Shanks and Aviva Jaffe, are midwives dedicated to the holy task of bringing babies into the world: they, too, feel their life's work threatened after a hemorrhaging mother is rushed to hospital. This quartet at the centre of Telegraph Avenue are subject to a dark blend of seismic tensions from racial disharmony and economic displacement to social uprootedness, as if their hearts have become untethered to any solid mooring in the world. As Nat tells his partner, "I don't know about you, but I feel like, Archy, if I don't have this place? I'm not sure I really have a place."

Adding to the angst, several old pigeons come home to roost. Archy's no-good absentee father, Luther Stallings, a former blaxploitation film actor of the '70s, comes stumbling back holding evidence of a decades-old murder (a glove – shades of O.J. Simpson) for which he hopes to extort enough blackmail money from a local councillor to make a comeback in the movies; only trouble is, Luther himself was an accomplice to the deed. Archy is also confronted with the sudden appearance of a teenage son whom he has never communicated with or supported, who was born out of wedlock and raised in Texas.

Like most men in Chabon's fiction, Archy and Nat seem bereft of suitable mentors or father figures, and embrace imaginary heroes from popular culture – TV, movies, comic books, vinyl records and the like. They are at best overgrown boys without a suitable reference manual to show them how to become adult men. (Nat has read plenty of comic books, but has no apparent knowledge of Jewish learning.) The women may seem equally unsettled, but at least they have a secret source of power, knowledge and authority in their exclusive and mystical ability to bring new life into the world.

The following passage, relating to childbirth, demonstrates Chabon's superb mastery of language: "There was a ripple of liquid and skin, then with a vaginal sigh, the little girl squirted face up into Gwen's wide hands. The small eyes were open, nebular and dull, but in the instant before she cried out, they ignited, and the child seemed to regard Gwen Shanks. The air was filled with a hot smell between sex and butchery."

Chapter III consists of a single sentence 12 pages long; Chabon said he wanted to replicate the sense of a filmmaker's roving camera that dollies and pans here and there and everywhere. Stylistically, it seems to resemble a passage from Ulysses, just as the characters are supposed to change, so too does the very mode of telling their intermingled stories.

Chabon is not as adept as, say, Anne Tyler in creating a sense of place – his Oakland is not nearly as vivid or as laden with sentimental landmarks as Tyler's delicious fictional Baltimore – and he sometimes spins so much pyrotechnically dazzling prose without any advancement of story that it exasperates rather than delights the reader. Inescapably and inevitably, Chabon must be regarded as a stylist, but he is not always a universalist: his references to arcane pop trivia may sometimes seem so obscure that readers may reasonably wish for an annotated edition.

Like the ensemble cast of the Quentin Tarantino film Pulp Fiction, the ensemble in Telegraph Avenue are low characters in search of salvation or transformation, and some of them find it in the miracle of human forgiveness.

To me, Telegraph Avenue seems a cross between Jonathan Franzen's The Corrections and an Elmore Leonard novel, with a few dashes of essence of Tarantino thrown in for good measure. An energetic celebration of genre storytelling that seems freighted with perhaps more episodic scenes than necessary, Telegraph Avenue seems as messy, slippery and yes, as full of irrepressible life as a newborn babe.

Some Girls, Some Hats and Hitler (Scribner) is the rediscovered Holocaust memoir by the late Trudi Kanter that tells the true story of a beautiful young Austrian Jewish hat designer who becomes involved with a romantic businessman and flees with him from Vienna to Prague to London amid the horrors engulfing Europe. An editor discovered the book (first published in 1984) in a second-hand London bookshop and became determined to bring it back into print.

Montreal author Nancy Richler's followup to her popular novel Your Mouth Is Lovely, The Imposter Bride (HarperCollins) tells the fictional story of Lily Azerov, a post-war bride-to-be who arrives in Montreal, marries Nathan Kramer, then abandons him and their baby daughter, leaving only a diary, an uncut diamond and a need to discover the truth about her real identity. The Giller Prize nominated book is now out in paperback.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Fusion jazz trio to play Al Green Theatre

Hadar Noiberg

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Fresh from touring the world, the Hadar Noiberg Trio comes to the Al Green Theatre on Nov. 22 at 8 p.m.

Hadar Noiberg is an Israeli-born, New York-based flutist, composer and arranger. She combines jazz improvisation, Middle Eastern and North African rhythms and melodies with western harmonic structure in her original compositions, as is evident on her CD, Journey Back Home.

For her Toronto concert, Noiberg will perform with double bassist Edward Perez, who's from Texas, and drummer Yoni Halevy, an Israeli who is subbing for Ziv Ravitz.

"The concept of the trio started because I get to play in various scenes in New York, including the jazz, Cuban and Brazilian scenes," Noiberg says. "What is beautiful about New York City is that you can play with people that come from these countries. I just love their sense of roots and how they feel connected to their music and culture."

"It made me think of my culture and what it means to be a jazz musician from Israel. I started learning more about Middle Eastern and Arabic music, and played with others who played jazz, but were also interested in Middle Eastern music."

She says that when eastern Europeans immigrated to Israel they were influenced by the Bedouins and other Arabs.

Interested in Middle Eastern music

"A modern style of music has come out of that, but I feel sometimes it has been left behind... I'm just trying to incorporate those old influences where you can have a melody that sounds a bit Middle Eastern, but then add jazz improvisational and harmonies... breaking the boundaries and trying to mesh all that into a language."

Noiberg began her career touring with the Young Philharmonic Orchestra. She studied classical music at the Tel Aviv Academy of Music and is the founding member of the celebrated African/Israeli fusion group Yemen Blues, which performed in Toronto last year at an Ashkenaz event.

Noiberg moved to New York eight years ago, enrolling in flute and composition at City College of New York. In 2007, the ASCAP Foundation granted Noiberg a Young Jazz Composer Award.

The trio's future includes a European tour and the recording of another CD in 2013. Noiberg also plans to continue performing with Brazilian and Cuban bands in New York City.

The concert in Toronto is co-presented by the Al Green Theatre in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, with support from the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation and the Consulate General of Israel, in conjunction with Toronto Downtown Jazz.

For tickets, contact the Al Green Theatre box office, 416-924-6211, ext. 0, www.algreentheatre.ca.

David Geffen reinvented himself as a somebody

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Hollywood mogul David Geffen has left an indelible impression in three fields: music, film and theatre. Not bad for a Jewish boy from Brooklyn whose dream was to earn $1,000 a week and drive a Cadillac.

Geffen, who reached billionaire status in 1995, is the subject of Susan Lacy's methodical and entertaining biopic, American Masters: Inventing David Geffen, which was premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival in September and is scheduled to be broadcast on the PBS network on Tuesday, Nov. 20 at 8 p.m.

Lacy leaves no stones unturned as she examines every phase of his highly productive life and career.

Starting out as a sorter in the mailroom of the William Morris Agency in New York City, Geffen became an agent/manager for such singers as Joni Mitchell. Launching Asylum Records, he managed the careers of, among others, Linda Ronstadt, John Lennon and the Eagles.

Always restless, he formed Geffen Pictures, producing films ranging from Risky Business (starring the virtually unknown Tom Cruise) to Little Shop of Horrors. All the while, he brought the celebrated musicals Dreamgirls and Cats to Broadway.

And in one of his most daring moves, he teamed up with Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg to create the first Hollywood movie studio in more than five decades, DreamWorks SKG.

As if these accomplishments may not be enough for a saturated viewer, Lacy documents Geffen's struggles with his homosexuality, his association with two major American politicians, Bill Clinton and Barack Obama, his heterosexual romance with Cher and his philanthropic ventures.

The title of Lacy's documentary is apt. Geffen, born in 1943, is a self-made man who invented himself.

Geffen's parents, Abraham and Batya, were east European Jews who met in Palestine and immigrated to the United States. He was a garment worker. She owned a corset shop.

Geffen loved movies and dreamed of living in Holly-

The young David Geffen and one of his clients, the Canadian singer Joni Mitchell wood and, true to his word, headed west after graduating from high school. Desperate to succeed, he yearned to be a "somebody" and strike it rich.

Landing in Los Angeles, he slept on a couch in his brother's apartment and finagled a role as an extra in a B movie. He nudged his foot into the door at William Morris by lying about his academic record. And he got hired and fired from a succession of jobs before becoming an agent, a position that required him to know nothing, he claims.

"I could bullshit on the phone," he says of his reputation as a legendary dealmaker.

Acting on advice, Geffen segued into the music business, while ducking the draft during the Vietnam War. His clients included Neil Young and a band, Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young. In 1971, when he was still not yet 30, he launched Asylum Records, a boutique label that coddled and nurtured up-and-coming talent.

Three years later, having sold the business, he joined Warner Brothers Pictures as a vice-president, but his tenure there was dismal, his first big reversal in Lotus Land. Geffen, never known for his diplomatic skills, rubbed important people the wrong way.

Bouncing back from the slough of despond, he established Geffen Records, building a stellar roster of artists from Elton John and Donna Summers to Guns N' Roses and Aerosmith.

MCA bought Geffen Records for a cool $550 million, and Geffen stayed on as chief executive officer.

Geffen reinvented himself as a producer, churning out movies like Lost in America, Interview with the Vampire and Beetle Juice. "These were great movies," opines Spielberg, one of his partners in his next and biggest project, DreamWorks SKG.

In tracing the arc of his achievements, Lacy interviews friends, colleagues, clients and journalists, including David Crosby, Barry Diller, Tom Hanks and Steve Martin.

They and others draw a portrait of a brash, caring, smart risk taker who had difficulty coming to terms with his sexuality, who described his 18-month relationship with Cher as "the greatest high" he had ever experienced, who broke with Bill Clinton after he bitterly disappointed him, and who donated millions of dollars to fund a medical school at the University of California.

Geffen, who was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2010, is also portrayed as a vindictive person. If you cross him, you may as well commit suicide, says a source. "Don't get into a fight with David," another interviewee observes. "He always wins."

Geffen, on screen at least, remains modest to a tee. "I have no talent, except to enjoy it and recognize it in others," he claims. This self-effacing comment, so atypical of Hollywood types, should be taken with a huge grain of salt. Geffen moved mountains in his hugely successful quest to be a "somebody" in America.

Film looks at Italian Catholics' conversion to Judaism

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Can a people's history be lost over time or can it live on in the soil of the land and the blood of the people?

This is the question that the documentary film The Mystery of San Nicandro, airing Nov. 18 at 8 p.m. on CBC's documentary channel, attempts to answer.

The "mystery" in question is the fairly well documented story of a group of Italian Catholic peasants in a small, isolated community in southern Italy who converted to Judaism in the 1920s without ever having laid eyes on a Jew.

These converts were under the spell of a Rasputin-like charismatic healer, Donato Manduzio. Returning home to San Nicandro crippled after World War I, Manduzio claimed to have visions from God and that he had been called like Moses to revive a faith that had long since disappeared.

Manduzio introduced dietary laws and worship of the Sabbath to his community. At the time, because of its isolation, they weren't even aware that other Jews existed anywhere else in the world. And other Jews weren't aware of them.

When Manduzio did eventually make contact with the rabbis in Rome, they considered him a crank and his community essentially rogue Catholics.

But Manduzio persisted, and in 1946, 80 people were formally converted to Judaism. A couple of years later, most of them immigrated to the new State of Israel, but not Manduzio, who had just died.

Several hundred Jews in Israel today are there because of Manduzio's visions.

The San Nicandro story is an interesting enough one for a documentary, but this film takes it a step further by connecting this to the history of southern Italy's Jewish conversos.

The film implies that the reason San Nicandro's Jews were so quick to convert is that, perhaps without knowing it, they were Spanish Jews whose ancestors had converted to Catholicism during the Inquisition. Judaism was in their blood.

Laura Cattari in a Hamilton synagogue.

One person who makes this claim is Hamilton, Ont.'s Laura Cattari. A Canadian of Italian descent, Laura was educated in a Catholic school but never made a spiritual connection to those roots.

She also believes that Judaism was in her blood. One day when she entered a synagogue, she felt as though she had returned home and started to search out her family's origins.

The documentary follows her journey to her ancestral hometown in Sicily, where a historian admits that her family surnames are of Jewish origin.

In a somewhat humorous scene, she takes this knowledge to distant relatives in the town whom she'd never seen before. These old Catholics don't take too kindly to her wild assertions. There never were any Jews there, they claim.

The Mystery of San Nicandro is not just about the San Nicandro Jews, but also about the renaissance of Judaism in southern Italy. Directed by Roger Pyke, it is a documentary well worth watching.

Maccabi announces its 'Team Canada'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Eight NCAA Division I players, five competing in European pro leagues and a handful of OHL and tier-two junior players, make up the bulk of the Canadian roster that will compete for hockey gold at the 2013 Maccabiah Games.

AHL centre Trevor Smith, who played 16 games for the Tampa Bay Lightning last season, is the biggest name on the roster, but hockey maven Alex Voihanski said the team is deep in talent and should compete for top spot at the Games.

Team Canada will likely face the stiffest competition from the U.S. squad, which has a large number of NCAA players to choose from. France and Israel will also ice teams.

The four-country tournament, to be held at the Canada Centre rink in Metulla, marks only the second time in Maccabiah history that hockey is featured at the Games. In 1997, Canada sent a star-studded lineup that won the gold medal.

Voihanski, who is largely responsible for assembling the 2013 team, said starting with the coaches, every effort is being made to ensure the athletes get a first-class experience in Israel.

Team Canada's bench boss will be "Iron" Mike Keenan, whose hockey resumé includes a Stanley Cup win with the New York Rangers and a Canada Cup victory in 1987. His assistants will be multiple Stanley Cup-winner Greg Gilbert, who coaches Saginaw Spirit of the OHL, and Mike Pelino, head coach of the OHL's Peterborough Petes who also has a gold medal from his time with the Canada's 2002 Olympic team.

The team will employ the "Team Canada" name and be outfitted in official Canadian gear, thanks to an agreement with Hockey Canada. Even the equipment manager and medical staff are associated with top-shelf organizations in the AHL and OHL, Voihanski said.

With the presence of so many quality hockey people, last June's tryouts attracted top-shelf talent, of which there is no shortage in the Jewish community, Voihanski said.

This year's squad should be very hard to beat, said Voihanski, who serves as general manager of International Scouting Services (ISS).

Seven of the players have NHL pedigrees, either as past or recent draft choices, or as minor leaguers playing for an NHL-affiliated team, he said.

"We're very strong up front. The strength of the team is our forwards," he said.

The talent level was so extensive that a lot of very good players were cut after a series of tryouts last spring. "It's a very deep team. I can't emphasize that enough," he said.

It's an old saw that a winning team needs strength down the middle, and Smith gets the team off to a good start in that department. The Ottawa-born and Vancouver-raised Smith plays for Wilkes-Barre Penguins, a Pittsburgh affiliate in the American Hockey League (AHL). Last year, he played for the Calder Cup-winning Norfolk Admirals, finishing sixth in AHL scoring. In 64 games, he had 26 goals and 43 assists; in 18 playoff games, he scored five goals and added 11 helpers. He played 16 games in the NHL after being called up by the Tampa Bay Lightning, scoring five points.

Joining Smith at centre are Andrew Calof and Daniel Radke, NCAA Division I players with Princeton and Lake Superior State respectively. Rounding out the position is Dylan Smoskowitz of the OHL Mississauga Steelheads. In 13 games with the Steelheads, he's scored 11 goals and added four assists.

On the wings are some familiar names: Michael and Adam Henrich. Michael was a first-round pick, 13th overall, of the Edmonton Oilers in 1998, while Adam was chosen in the second round, 60th overall, by Tampa Bay in 2002. Both now play in Europe, Michael for Dornbirn EC in the Austria Premier League and Adam for Alpege HC in the Italy Premier League.

'We're very strong up front'

The Henrichs are one of three brother combinations on the Canadian squad; Zachary and Spencer Hyman and Noah and Brendan Schwartz are the others.

Zach Hyman was a fifth-round selection of the Florida Panthers in 2010; Spencer plays defence for the Hamilton Red Wings in the Ontario Junior Hockey League.

Noah Schwartz is a wing with London Nationals in the GOJHL, another tier-two junior loop, while Brendan plays defence on the same team.

Other notables include Daniel Erlich, currently with the University of Western Ontario but a past OHL player with London Knights and Barrie Colts; Benjamin Rubin, who now plays with Brest Albatros in the elite French league and Cory

Zachary Hyman

Pecker, a winger with Sheffield Steelers in the top English league. Pecker has also donned Canadian colours twice before at the Spengler Cup and once, way back in 1997, with Team Canada at the Maccabiah Games. Pecker and Michael Henrich were 17-year-olds on that team, Voihanski noted.

Spencer Hyman is looking forward to the Israel experience and playing with his brother.

"When you play for Canada, a lot is expected of you," he said.

The Maccabiah will mark his first-ever trip to Israel, though he's been studying about the country for years. "I'm really interested in visiting Israel. I always wanted to go visit there," he said.

Like his brother, he's a graduate of the Robbins Hebrew Academy in Toronto. Two other brothers attended the school, while a fifth went to Leo Baeck. All five brothers are hockey players, Spencer said.

"Zach can score, and he can be a power forward as well. He's a gifted offensive player. I'm a defensive defenceman. I prefer to shut guys down," Spencer said.

At 19, he's a little more than a year younger than Zach, and both played together for one year in Hamilton. After joining Zach on Team Canada, Spencer will join his brother next fall at the University of Michigan, where he's earned a hockey scholarship.

Among the other players on team Canada are Daniel Altschuler, who is goaltender for the Oshawa Generals in the Ontario Hockey League (OHL), and Cody Rosen, who backstops Clarkson University, a NCAA Division I school.

Voihanski said the Maccabiah Games offers players a unique opportunity to visit the country while receiving elite-level coaching.

"It's an unbelievable opportunity and experience to be in the Maccabiah Games and to play for Keenan," Voihanski said.

Even he is excited about the prospect of participating in the Maccabiah: "I can't wait to get there and walk in front of 50,000 people [at the opening ceremonies]," he said.

Here's Team Canada's complete roster:

Centres: Andrew Calof, Princeton University; Daniel Radke, Lake Superior State; Trevor Smith, Wilkes-Barre Penguins; Dylan Smoskowitz, Mississauga Steelheads.

Wingers: Daniel Erlich, University of Western Ontario; David Friedmann, Robert Morris University; Adam Henrich, Alpege HC; Michael Henrich, Dornbirn EC; Zachary Hyman, University of Michigan; Cory Pecker, Sheffield Steelers; Benjamin Rubin, Brest Albatros (France); Eric Satim, Knoxville Ice Bears; Noah Schwartz, London Nationals.

Defencemen: Ori Abramson, Providence College; Casey Fazekas, Morrum Gois (Sweden); Matthew Herskovitz, Providence College; Spencer Hyman, Hamilton Red Wings; Oriel McHugh, Oklahoma Blazers; Brendan Schwartz, London Nationals; Zach Sternberg, Lake Superior State.

Goalies: Daniel Altschuler, Oshawa Generals; Cody Rosen, Clarkson University.

Singer makes multicultural music

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Donna Greenberg

Donna Greenberg sings in five languages on her new album, Song in the Wind.

Several tracks are recorded twice on the album – once in English and once in another language – Italian, Spanish or French. The title track is sung partly in English and partly in Brazilian Portuguese.

"It has a different quality and brings out the lyrics in a different way, and it can support a different feeling," the Toronto singer says.

Those are Greenberg's singing languages. In order to get the songs just right, Greenberg studies the languages and she works with translators. But there's more to it than that.

"I try not to just have a translation done," she says. "I try to capture the essence of that language."

For example, she described writing her song Living on the Outside, or Voiloir Qu'on Soit Ici, as the French version is titled.

"It's a very sad song. When we first worked on it... if it was in French, it would have a very Edith Piaf feeling," she says, referring to a renowned French ballad singer.

"It's a very dramatic and sad song – a ballad that you would hear on the street," she says, in that it's about an outsider in society. "How many people in our society feel that way?"

However, when she recorded the English version, she wanted it to have more of a cabaret feel. Though the subject matter is the same, the different instrumentation gives these two songs very different feelings.

There are challenges that come along with performing in multiple languages. For example, some languages tend to have more syllables, so some lines might have to be a bit longer.

"We have to be very careful," Greenberg says. "You don't want to change the rhythm of the music too much, but sometimes you have to because there are more syllables."

She says people have commented to her that when they hear a song for the second time on the album, they often don't notice that it's the same. The music and the language really change it.

Greenberg says on this album, she tried to expose herself a bit more than on her previous works. Her stories range from happy fantasy – Song in the Wind is about a girl on a mountain who was reuniting with a past lover (who is represented through guest vocalist Marcelo Neves) – and harsh reality, such as Solitudes, written about her friend who had passed away from cancer.

"I had the privilege of being at her bedside before she died," she says, explaining that she was sitting with her friend's son. "He turned to me and said, 'Solitudes, that's what we really are.'"

That quote stayed with her throughout the funeral, and she ended up using it for the final track on the album.

"I was struck with the contrast of the closeness he felt, and the way we reach for other people we love," she says. "That's our instinct, but we know that we... die alone."

Greenberg, who also teaches ballet, has spent 25 years working as a dance teacher and choreographer, began recording music later in her career life. She says she always admired people who chased their dreams, but never knew how to chase her own. But once she figured out, she went right to it, releasing three albums in three years.

A 'ratical' re-telling of Cinderella

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Amy Lee

Winnipeg-born actress Amy Lee plays Claws, a rat, in the North American premiere of Cinderella (a Ratical retelling), the latest offering from Young People's Theatre (YPT) running on the Mainstage until Dec. 30.

This version of Cinderella, written by Mike Kenny (who wrote The Railway Children), is described as fun-filled romp filled with witty songs, fun dancing and inventive storytelling.

"It is a really wonderful adaptation. I love the modern and unique take on it," explains Lee. "It is told from the perspective of the rats (Ears, Teeth, Claws, Tail and Whiskers). They develop a relationship with Cinderella. Cinderella is bullied by her stepsisters and her stepmother and she finds some comfort in befriending the rats. It helps her get through it."

Lee says that in this adaptation Cinderella is very independent of mind and spirit, she's not the typical princess who needs to be saved.

"She's given an opportunity to make a better life for herself and she does. At the core of the story is the the characters in The Invisible Girl. She recently completed the short film Pas de Trois which is scheduled to air on Bravo.

In the spring she'll become a resident artist educator with YPT, and says that for her, that YPT is a magical place and the more she can be there the happier she is.

Lee said Cinderella is a lot of fun for kids and adults.

"Kids will love it because the rats are so silly and the stepmother and stepsisters are so over the top, but still rooted characters. I think adults will love it too because it is quite witty and intelligent in its humour with fantastic original music."

Lee also plays one of the evil stepsisters, Thatur, opposite the other sister named Thisun. The production is directed by Allen MacInnis. Lee's joined on the stage by fellow actors Matt Brown, Dmitry Chepovetsky, Deann deGrujter, Steffi Di-Domenicantonio, Elodie Gillett and Richard Lee.

For more information on Cinderella (a Ratical retelling) online, visit: youngpeoplestheatre.ca, for tickets call the Box Office at: 416.862.2222.

Author sparks controversy on both side of Mideast conflict

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Shani Boianjiu didn't set out to become a published author, but now she's touring the world promoting her book, The People of Forever Are Not Afraid (Random House).

What began as a thesis for her studies at Harvard University led Boianjiu to be named the youngest recipient of the U.S. National Book Foundation's Top 5 Under 35 Award in 2011.

"I never thought this would see the light of day," said the 25-year-old Israeli, adding that writing without the intention of publication probably helped her imagination run wild.

This dark story features three Israeli women completing their army service. The book, which is separated into chapters that are almost like short stories, has sparked controversy.

Although Boianjiu has received many positive reviews – and she said the vast majority fall into this category – some pro-Israel or Jewish people have panned the book, calling it "self-hating Jewish literature," portraying Israel in a negative light.

Yet on the other side, pro-Palestinian and Arabic people have said her book tries to glorify the Israel Defence Forces and to humiliate the Palestinian people.

"I actually saw it as a kind of accomplishment, that I managed to anger people on both sides," Boianjiu joked. But she said she expected this type of criticism.

"There's this war of narratives when it comes to the Middle East in the West," she said. "Everybody wants the West to hear their own narrow, very specific view of the conflict."

She also said many of these people, particularly the Israeli critics, have not read her book – at least not in its entirety. The book is currently only available in English, though it will be translated into Hebrew and several other languages next year, including Korean, Serbian and Chinese.

Shani Boianjiu

Translation can be a bit difficult, said Boianjiu, who is working with a translator to write a Hebrew version. Some of the charm in the book is the way the English words are used, she said. "You have to find different ways to convey the same type of playfulness." She said she's a bit nervous for the Hebrew translation's release, mostly because she is embarrassed to have her family and friends read it.

"When you write a book, you let your imagination go to the darkest or craziest [places] you can, and then to know your friends, who have known you your whole life, are going to read it," she said. "In an ideal world, I would have it so no one that knows me personally could read the book."

In the story, the three friends spend time in the army, with tons of downtime. They spend a lot of their time looking for ways to cure their boredom through playing pranks and sleeping around, and injecting themselves with water to keep cool.

While there are small parts of the story that are based on Boianjiu's experience, she insisted the story is pure fiction, and a work of art.

Some portions are "more grounded" than others, but she's hesitant to call them realistic experiences of an IDF soldier. However, "anything is possible. These stories come out of my imagination, but... everything is a 'what-if' scenario," she said.

Boianjiu has received some criticism in reviews for her portrayal of men in the story. Critics have referred to them as almost incidental characters, just there for the women's pleasure, and many of them die early and violently.

However, she said she thinks the problem is that people aren't used to women being the subject of military novels.

"If you look at all coming-of-age novels, or all military novels that have male heroes – which are basically all military novels except for a few – you could make a similar argument that the women are incidental," she said. "I don't think that people make [these comments] at all about male war novels."

Additionally, military service is somewhat segregated in terms of gender, she said, so it makes some sense that the focus is on the friendships between the women, rather than their relationships. Boianjiu didn't intend to publish her book. After she submitted it as part of her thesis, an agent got wind of the story, and asked to see some pages. A week later, it was sold.

The fact that the book was picked up and published so quickly means Boianjiu didn't have time to stop and think about how it would be received, and whether it was a good idea to publish it right away, she said.

"In hindsight, I wish it was a difficult decision, but it happened so fast and it was just so unrealistic for me, that I never stopped and thought, 'Do I want to publish this book and have the world read it?'" she said. "In retrospect, it was like, 'What was I thinking?'"

Following on the success of this book, she said she will keep on writing stories. But she's not sure whether she wants to be a full-time author due to the uncertain nature of the career. Just because her first book did so well, doesn't mean her future works will find the same success, she said.

There are plans for her first novel to become available in 25 countries, so people all around the world will be able to make their own interpretations of the story, she said. But apart from lamenting that many reviewers – even the positive ones – may have missed the point of the story, Boianjiu doesn't mind that she's generated so much controversy. She knew it was bound to happen.

"The critiques were mostly about things I knew people wouldn't like, and I still chose to go this route because I felt that was true for this type of book," she said. "I wrote a work of fiction and a work of art. Hopefully, when people read the book in full, they'll see that."

Israelis, Canadians discuss water technologies

Last month I began a series of columns dealing with Canada, Israel and water. One of the challenges I laid out was the development of joint opportunities for Canadians and Israelis in this area.

For most residential consumers, the key concerns about water fall into the following areas: is the water I am receiving clean and safe; is the water I have used being taken away without any problems; how much am I being charged for these water-related activities?

Someone else usually worries about how the water is extracted, purified and shipped to the consumer, and how the water, once used, is removed, cleaned and returned to nature.

The Israel Economic Mission to Canada, which aims to foster trade and investment between Canadian and Israeli companies, recently hosted a delegation of six Israeli water-technology companies in Toronto. The companies, recruited by the Israel Export & International Cooperation Institute, met with leading Canadian engineering firms that offer significant services in industrial water, water infrastructure and water treatment. The Israeli companies also participated in a business meeting with the Ontario Clean Water Agency (OCWA).

The Israeli companies presented water-technology solutions from communications systems and control valves to filtration, desalination and advanced drip-line and piping systems. At the OCWA meeting, it seemed clear to me that attendees were well aware of Israel's leadership position in the area of water. They were there to gather more information about the specific offerings each company could bring.

Nick Reid, vice-president of strategic partnerships for the OCWA, articulated the business needs – could these solutions demonstrably extend the life of existing water infrastructure; could they reduce the amount of energy required in the extraction, purification and shipment of water and the removal, cleaning and return of the water to the environment; could this be accomplished through increased automation or improved technologies, with the end goal of driving out cost and/or improving quality?

Representatives of the Israeli companies had a mission to identify and influence decision-makers who were either industrial users of water or municipal providers of clean-water and waste-water services. Some of the Israeli companies have already entered into discussions as a result of the meetings over the two days they were in Toronto, and the Export Institute has remarked on the success of the delegation. Ran Yehezkel, head of Israel's Economic Mission to Canada, said, "Because water technologies have broad applications across many sectors from industrial use to municipalities, targeting the right players to meet the delegation was a difficult choice given that southern Ontario is a leading hub of water innovation in Canada, if not North America."

"The meeting with OCWA was very beneficial to the delegation to understand the complexities of water management in Ontario as well as business making decisions. At the Israel Economic Mission, we will continue introducing Israeli water technologies to the right decision-makers to bring cost-effective and environmentally sustainable solutions to Canadians." Next month, some ideas on how we can help Israeli water companies communicate their value and to finalize business in Canada.

Most of the time, a crossing guard stands aware and ready to hold up her or his sign to halt traffic so that school children can cross safely.

I watched a crossing guard recently. It was after lunch, and none of the kids were around. I waved at him and said hello from my car window. He did not wave back. I believe he was standing on guard with all his heart. As I drove by, I remembered an experience I had with a crossing guard many years before.

It was around the end of the 20th century, and I was on radio doing a show called Marty & Avrum: The Food Guys. My partner, Marty Galin, and I had created a show about the people behind the restaurants, such as the Greek family who had arrived here 50 years ago with a drachma in one pocket and eventually owned an entire street of build-

Urban Writer

One sunny day, I stopped around Queen Street and Broadview Avenue and said hello to the middle-aged crossing guard. She had few teeth, appeared wind-blown and was upbeat and enthusiastic about her job. She seemed to take her task very seriously. Many people with low-paying jobs often seem to be quite ings. These narratives fascinated us. I believe they interested many people.

I would wander around the streets of Toronto with a tape recorder asking people about their experiences in certain eateries, or a waitress or waiter about their biggest tips, or the delivery guy about his strangest delivery.

driven to perform well and succeed at their task. This crossing guard was one of them.

I asked the crossing guard if I could bother her for a moment. When she said yes, I explained that I was an on-air host for a food show and wondered about her favourite restaurant.

She then told me the following story: "Once a year, my husband takes me out on our anniversary to the most marvellous restaurant. A woman dressed very nicely at the front door greets us and walks us over to our favourite table. We sit together, romantically, a little shy, and go through the menu. When we are ready we ask the waitress to bring us a 1/2 chicken each and potatoes and gravy. It's the same dish every year."

The crossing guard continued: "The best part of the evening is when our wait-staff comes by and refills our glasses with water. We feel so special. The food arrives pretty quickly and is beautifully laid out on the plate. My husband and I take our time, talk, sometimes kiss, and just enjoy our night out."

"Could I ask you please," I said even though I really didn't want to bother her as she told her story. "Which restaurant do you and your husband go to every year on your anniversary?"

She responded, with a huge grin, "Swiss Chalet," referring to a chain of chicken restaurants in Canada, a low- to middle-price place with a cozy atmosphere that resembles a winter chalet.

I smiled at the wife and a wave of warmth washed over me, as I had just heard the most romantic story ever.

She wished me well. The light turned green and the crossing guard walked a child across the street, beaming as she went, yet totally aware she was protecting somebody's gem with her STOP sign and riveted gaze.

Fill a small plastic bag with the remaining chocolate and cut a tiny hole in the corner; pipe a bit of the chocolate onto a mini chocolate chip and stick it to the top of the wafer to create the stem.

'Life has changed'

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — It was obvious that last Wednesday's assassination of Hamas Military chief Ahmed labari would bring even more rocket attacks on Israel. The first air raid siren in Tel Aviv the next day, Nov. 15, was eerie and got the blood pumping. The subsequent sirens weren't any less unnerving.

When The CJN asked me for "a first-person reflection of what's going on," I felt a bit guilty that this piece would be written by someone in Tel Aviv and not from a community down south, where life without sirens and rockets is barely remembered.

But I am not writing to complain.

Life has changed. Even if in the smallest ways.

As a journalist, I covered Katyushas falling on northern Israel in the Second Lebanon War in 2006. It was scary. I worried about my friends in the army and those whose homes were being hit by the rockets. But when I got home to Tel Aviv, I could disconnect. During Operation Cast Lead in 2008-09, this humming city was still in its own bubble. I was concerned, of course, but it was for others, at least one degree away from me.

Now, my family is in the line of fire. Hearing that first siren last week was spine-chilling and surreal, even if expected. It's a sound you can't dismiss once it's been heard. Every motorcycle that passes on the street below makes me question what I'm hearing and whether I need to leave my sofa for the stairwell.

When the air raid siren wails, some of the neighbours in our building walk down the flights of stairs to the safe room on the ground floor of our apartment building. But because I've just had stomach surgery, I walk, as my five-year-old son says, "just faster than a turtle." So, we head over to the stairwell instead. It turns out the sirens are a form of bonding with the neighbours in the stairwell.

Degree Protested

KINGSTON — Jewish alumni of Queen's University protested the school's decision to award honorary degrees to former U.S. president Jimmy Carter and his wife, Rosalynn, at fall convocation this week. The CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs CIIA, Shimon Fogel, told the National Post that CIIA received 50 complaints from graduates who said the move would damage Queen's reputation because Carter, 88, has called Israel an apartheid state. It's the first honorary degree from a Canadian school for the Nobel Peace Prize winner. Queen's principal Daniel Woolf said the couple were honoured for their "philanthropic and advocacy work in areas such as housing and mental health."

Candidate Guilty

MONTREAL — A defeated candidate in the last Côte St. Luc municipal election who claimed to represent the Sephardi community says he may appeal a court ruling that found him guilty of offering a financial inducement to an opponent, also Sephardi, to drop out of the council race. A judge ruled Charles Lugassy broke the law by offering to reimburse the electoral expenses of Sonia Cohen-Peillon if she withdrew from the November 2009 election. Lugassy faces losing his right to vote or seek elected office for five years. He may also be fined up to $1,000. Longtime incumbent Glenn Nashen won the election.

No Malmö Suspects

STOCKHOLM — Police in Malmö, Sweden, have no suspects in September's attack on the city's Jewish community centre. Police told JTA that all charges were dropped against the two young men they arrested shortly after the Sept. 28 attack. "We have concluded the suspects could not have done it," a spokesperson said. "The investigation

Under-14 Circumcision Ban Tabled

BERLIN — Some 50 left-wing lawmakers in Germany have signed on to a proposal that would bar ritual circumcision for boys under the age of 14.

The legislators — from the Social Democratic, Left and Greens parties — hope to pre-empt a bill that would allow Jewish and Muslim parents to choose ritual circumcision for an infant son under strict regulations, including medical training for the circumciser and the use of anesthesia. The bill allowing ritual circumcision, which is awaiting parliamentary approval, was submitted last month.

Under the new proposal, the non-medical circumcision of infants would be prohibited and the procedure would have to be carried out by a trained urologist or pediatric surgeon, according to German news reports. The legislators reportedly insist that the child himself should be able to decide whether to allow "such a serious interference with his bodily integrity."

The proposal was submitted to the German Parliament by three lawmakers. The new attempt is expected to meet vigorous opposition in the Bundestag.

The current campaign against circumcision in Germany picked up steam last May after a Cologne court ruled the circumcision of a minor was criminal assault. The ruling came to light in the general public in June. In response, Jewish and Muslim leaders demanded a legal response to protect their religious freedom.

is ongoing." The two 18-year-olds were arrested shortly after an explosion was heard outside the city's Jewish community centre, which also houses a Jewish day school. Police at first declined to call the attack antisemitic, but eventually called it a hate crime. In 2009, unidentified persons set off an explosive device outside the city's shul. In the recent years, some 70 antisemitic incidents were reported annually in Malmö, a city that is 30 to 40 per cent Muslim and whose Jewish community numbers a few hundred. The per capita prevalence of antisemitic incidents in Malmö is twice that of Stockholm, the capital.

Montreal gets its first Jewish mayor

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Michael Applebaum has become the first Jewish mayor of Montreal in its 370-year history, and the first anglophone mayor in a century.

He replaces Gerald Tremblay, who resigned following damning testimony about his administration at the Charbonneau commission on corruption in Quebec politics.

Applebaum will serve as interim mayor until the November 2013 election, after city council voted 31-29 for him over Richard Deschamps on Nov. 16 in a secret ballot. Three ballots were spoiled.

Applebaum, 49, who held the number 2 position at city hall — chair of the executive committee — for 11 1/2 years, has said he won't run for mayor in the next election.

First elected to city council in 1994.

Applebaum resigned the chairmanship of the executive committee after the governing Union Montreal party chose Deschamps, an executive committee vice president, as its candidate for interim mayor. Some suggested Applebaum's French was not sufficiently fluent. Applebaum last week quit Union Montreal and announced he would run independently.

Applebaum, who is also mayor of the Côte des Neiges-Notre-Dame-de-Grâce borough, has strong ties to the Jewish community and has been openly supportive of Israel.

He has spoken eloquently about the Jewish state at the annual downtown Yom Ha'atzmaut rallies, has regularly attended Canadian Jewish Public Affairs Committee events, and, in 2006, refused a request by the pro-Palestinian group Tadamon for a minute of silence at a borough council meeting for a Montreal family killed in Lebanon by Israeli shelling during the conflict with Hezbollah.

Michael Applebaum

Last year, Applebaum, along with fellow councillor Marvin Rotrand, spearheaded a petition to have a public place in Montreal named in memory of Montreal writer Mordecai Richler.

Applebaum, known for his unflappability and fiscal responsibility, was elevated by Tremblay to the second-most powerful job at city hall in the wake of an earlier scandal in 2011 that saw Applebaum's predecessor resign under a cloud. He was the second Jew to ever hold that job.

Applebaum insisted he never thought he'd become a politician. He was a young father of three who had been working since his teens in his family's shoe store on Notre Dame Street when he became a petitioner at city hall in 1993. He and his neighbours were incensed that the city would not be putting up an outdoor rink in Snowdon's MacDonald Park that winter.

Before being named to the executive committee in 2009, Applebaum was a real estate agent. Critics have questioned his lack of a professional background.

Applebaum told The C/N after becoming executive committee chair in April 2011 that having worked hard in business since his teens and the values he was raised with, rooted in Judaism, have put in him in good stead.

"I think if you are intelligent, can grasp the issues and have good people around you, that is what counts," he said.

Applebaum said his religion has never been an issue in public life.

When my husband died suddenly, my whole world stopped. I didn't even know where to begin with the arrangements. It was 2am. I called Benjamin's. To my surprise, Michael Benjamin himself answered the phone. They took care of every imaginable detail. They even had umbrellas for guests when it rained at the gravesite. I will never forget their wonderful care.

As part of its coverage of the fighting between Israel and Hamas, CTV National News last weekend also reported upon the many demonstrations against Israel here in Canada and around the world.

The writer of the news spot characteristically characterized the anti-Israel protests as being conducted by "concerned Canadians rally[ing] for peace."

The charity was misplaced.

Most of these concerned Canadians have one singular obsession: they don't really want a Jewish state to exist in the Middle East.

Among the organizations calling out their demonstration troops and leading the charge against Israel were, for example, the Palestinian Solidarity Network and the Coalition Against War and Racism.

As of this writing, on Nov. 18, protests had taken place in every major city across the country.

CTV National News reported that Peggy Morton from the Coalition Against War and Racism said, "We organized emergency demonstrations across Canada in quite a few cities to call on the international community to immediately put a stop to the bombing and terrible aggression against Gaza. What is said is that some rockets were fired in response to some Palestinians being killed, so that's the pretext to launch all-out attacks. If these rockets were sent, how is that a justification for collective punishment on the people of Gaza?" (My emphasis)

CTV also reported the following statement on the website of the Canadian Alliance for Peace: "The Canadian Peace Alliance condemns this collective punishment of the people of Gaza, who have endured a life under siege for years. We call on our member groups and supporters to endorse and join demonstrations across Canada in opposition to these brutal attacks. It is time for the people of Canada and the official opposition to stand on the side of peace and justice and condemn these illegal attacks."

The fraudulent ralliers

In addition to marching in the Canadian cities, the anti-Israel protesters marched in New York, Paris, Sydney and every large city in Italy, urging governments to "put an end to the massacre of Palestinian people in Gaza and to stop the Israeli war machine."

An online anti-Israel group calling itself Electronic Intifada sprang into action the day after Israel retaliated against Hamas, heralding a coordinated network of worldwide demonstrations against the Jewish state with the following announcement: "While Israel's aggressions continue to mount against people in Gaza, activists around the world are planning emergency protests."

The list of the locations of the subsequent protests in North America was helpfully compiled by a group called The Jewish Voice for Peace.

The brazen fraudulence of the names of these various organizations – save for the Palestinian Solidarity Network, which lets you know exactly for whom they troll – is matched only by the breathtaking ignorance or willful blindness or transparent malevolence of their leaders' statements. Their accusations, slogans and rhetoric are simply another form of their contempt for the truth.

The facts should be told.

Israel struck Gaza last Wednesday to remove a mortal threat to its citizens. Four days earlier, on Nov. 10, Hamas-controlled operatives shot an anti-tank missile at a jeep in Israel carrying four IDF soldiers. The attack against the soldiers in the jeep was soon followed by an unceasing barrage of some 120 rockets and mortars fired at the people in southern Israel.

The deadly nature of the threat posed by the Hamas arsenal is strikingly illustrated by the comparative maps inset.

Israel's first strike was to eliminate Hamas' military commander and then the vast arsenal of the terrorist organization's weaponry. All of its subsequent strikes as of this writing four days after the start of the operation, have been to the same purpose.

Not one civilized country on earth would have acted differently to truly stop the "terrible aggression" against its citizens and for the sake of real peace and justice in the world.

The groups demonstrating against Israel effectively confer immunity upon the leaders of Hamas and its murderous actions against the Jewish state. By their support, the organizations also ensure that the misery of the Palestinian people will continue.

Kashrut agency denies coercion in labour case

Mashgichim offered 'generous' holiday bonuses

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

The Kashruth Council of Canada is defending itself against allegations that it's pressuring a group of mashgichim to give back money it was ordered to pay them by the Ontario Ministry of Labour.

On Aug. 16, a ministry inspection found that over a five-month period in 2011, the Kashruth Council, which oversees the COR kosher symbol, had violated the Employment Standards Act with respect to minimum wage, public holiday pay, vacation time, work hours, and public holidays.

The ministry ordered the Kashruth Council to pay more than $10,000 in total to 58 present and former mashgichim (kashrut supervisors), which it did.

However, on Oct. 23, the agency's director of operations, Jay Spitzer, sent an email to the 58 mashgichim, warning of a "protracted mediation process" – a reference to its appeal of the ministry's ruling before the Ontario Labour Relations Board (OLRB) – and urging them to help shorten this process by signing a settlement agreement waiving their claim and returning the money.

The email said that "in order to complete this process, the OLRB requires that all the employees... sign the attached." It did not advise the mashgichim to seek independent counsel.

Two days later, on Oct. 25, Spitzer's email, along with the ministry's order to pay, was leaked to FailedMessiah.com, an anti-haredi blog. It published the documents and claimed the Kashruth Council was pressuring employees to give back the money awarded to them by the ministry.

The Kashruth Council told The CJN that its supervisors are paid above and beyond the law, that ministry inspectors made calculation errors in determining the $10,000 figure, and that there has been no pressure on workers to sign over the money.

Spokesperson Richard Rabkin said that as of last Friday, 55 of the 58 kashrut supervisors named by the ministry inspection had signed the document. (The organization currently employs some 100 mashgichim, mostly part time.)

Rabkin said the negative publicity surrounding this issue stems entirely from a personal vendetta by a disgruntled former kashrut supervisor named Morley Rand, who was not among the 58 named in the ministry inspection report.

In a separate but related case in 2011 involving Rand, the Kashruth Council argued before the OLRB that its mashgichim were "holders of religious office," which would have exempted them from the Employment Standards Act (ESA) entirely. The OLRB ruled that at least some mashgichim are regular employees and must be compensated accordingly.

In a statement on its website, the Kashruth Council said its overtime policy already meets the criteria for, in the words of a September 2010 ministry report, "a greater right or benefit to the employees" under the provisions of the ESA. It pays its mashgichim overtime after 10 hours on any given shift, instead of after a 44-hour week, as the ESA requires. It said it also offers mashgichim "generous" twice-yearly holiday bonuses. "Our mashgichim... are the lifeblood of our organization and our community."

The Kashruth Council told The CJN that calculation errors account for most of the $10,000 the ministry said it owed to the 58 mashgichim.

For example, Rabkin explained, in the case of "working mashgichim," who are paid in part by the Kashruth Council and in part by the establishments they supervise, the ministry inspector would have only seen the council's portion, making it look like those mashgichim were getting less than minimum wage.

In an Aug. 27 email to all Kashruth Council mashgichim following the inspection, Spitzer said that "[the Ministry of Labour] officer who conducted the audit made her best effort to understand COR's payroll/employment system, but the complexities of our setup are not easily absorbed."

In an email to The CJN, Rabkin explained that when "when they realized that most of the findings of the audit were due to clerical errors in how the auditor captured COR's data, a few of the affected mashgichim contacted the OLRB to inform the OLRB that they had no interest in pursuing the action. The OLRB itself raised the idea... that if the affected employees signed a release saying that they were not interested in pursuing the action, then the action would not proceed."

He said most of the 58 mashgichim named by ministry were owed "insignificant" amounts, generally $5 or less.

One was owed $3,000 and the rest were owed $7,000 in total.

Israel must prevail

Except for the children, there is no hierarchy in mourning.

Grief, sorrow and heartache accompany all death of all innocents from all places, irrespective of loyalties and causes. The current exchange of fire between Hamas and Israel is no different.

But there was indeed something especially despicable when Hamas aimed its rockets last weekend at Jerusalem. And it did not go unnoticed by even veteran Mideast observers.

David Horowitz, editor of The Times of Israel, poignantly captured the sentiments when he wrote: "In firing missiles toward Jerusalem – firing indiscriminately – they [Hamas leaders] showed utter indifference to the lives of their own brothers, sisters, parents. Those rockets could have gone anywhere. They could have killed anyone. They were aimed at areas filled with Israelis and Palestinians, with Jews, Christians and Muslims. Those rockets could have slammed into places holy to Jews, to Christians, and to Muslims. Their own people. Their own most venerated places. For Hamas, all targets are fair game. For in their malevolence, they have persuaded themselves that they are fighting a holy war in whose cause the most reprehensible actions are rendered laudable."

Hamas is a particularly vile enemy.

Its chief motive, its obsessive purpose, its highest enterprise is the annihilation of the Jewish state and the Jewish people who comprise it. For Hamas leaders, the "usual" endeavours of nation building – establishing hospitals, schools, roads – are lower on the list of national priorities.

What other explanation could there have been to the launching by Hamas at the start of last week, alone, some 120 rockets and mortars into Israel?

That they did not foresee the fiery extent of Israel's response was simply the latest betrayal of their own people. Why would they not expect that their fierce and focused desire to harm the Jewish state would not be met by an equally fierce and focused desire by the Jewish state to resist, defend against and prevent such harm?

In striking last Wednesday at Ahmed Jabari, the military commander of Hamas, the Sunday Times of London wrote that "the Israeli government had killed the instigator of virtually every attack from Gaza in recent years." Jabari was the exemplar of Hamas leaders. He rallied his people around a flag of destruction. Where are the Hamas builders?

Those who condemn Israel for fighting back against the Hamas destroyers mock truth and undermine the future of their own societies.

"Who are these people?" Horowitz rhetorically asked of the Hamas leaders.

"They are people who glory in death. Since we delight in life, we had better prevail," he answered himself. Indeed, Israel must prevail for its own sake, and also for the sake of the civilized world.

Biting hand that feeds them

The barrage of rockets, mortars and missiles from Gaza to Israel has escalated recently. Southern Israelis are feeling abandoned and increasingly getting traumatized, living in fear all the time. Children cannot sleep and need counselling. My old mother living in Ashdod is scared as never before.

Striking terror targets after the event has occurred is not helping. Nor are the verbal threats of Israeli politicians. It's time to act differently. The Israeli government should try non-military measures to bring the Hamas government to its knees. Cut off the supply of electricity, water and daily supplies flowing into Gaza. Don't let Gazans into Israel for medical treatment. Don't let them bite the hand that feeds them. The Israeli government should try it for a week and stop being afraid of the world and United Nations reaction. In any case, they don't care about Israel (my government of Canada will always support you, please remember). People of Gaza will revolt against their rulers and there should be peace.

IDF likened to King David

The precision with which the Israel Defence Forces continue to surgically pinpoint their retaliatory defensive rocket attacks on their Arab terrorist enemies can surely be likened to King David's lethal slingshot 3,000 years ago, taking out the massive Philistine army's nine-foot-giant, Goliath, who criticized, threatened and insulted the Jews – with 40 days of taunts – as it is said. Sound familiar? It should. The conflict between Israel and Hamas is biblical history repeating itself for the umpteenth time, and extending itself into the 21st century. It will never stop completely, but each intermittent finale will always end the same way – ad infinitum. As Albert Einstein said, so succinctly, and, in this case, prophetically: "Insanity is doing the same thing over and over again and expecting different results." Tragic, isn't it?

East End Madrassah

On June 5, The CJN published a letter by Muntazir Jaffer, director of operations of the Islamic Shia Ithna Asheri Jamaat (ISIJ) of Toronto, otherwise known as the Jaffari Centre. Jaffer accused me and another community leader of making "baseless and inflammatory remarks." He provided several examples of his community's "promotion of Canadian values."

I awaited the police investigation report before issuing a response to The CJN letter. Following a six-month investigation, the York Region Police conclusively found that the above-mentioned institutions were in fact teaching antisemitism to children at the elementary school level. ("Police refuse to lay charges against madrassah," Nov. 15). While not criminally charging them, the report held the imam and the school principal of Toronto's East End Madrassah responsible for the hate content in the curriculum.

The police investigation validated our initial findings that the curriculum at the Madrassah spoke of "Jewish plots and treacheries" and contextualized Nazism in a poor comparison to the Jewish People. It is unfortunate that leaders of both the Jaffari Centre and ISIJ believe this report fully exonerates them and the Madrassah; it seems they either do not understand the true significance of the report, or are wilfully ignorant of the concerns raised about the school teaching children to hate Jews for years.

Aaron Apple's Spin-o-thon

Aaron Apple's second annual Spin-o-thon fundraising event was a bold effort to raise money for children who need medication not covered by OHIP ("Charity aids chronically ill kids," Oct. 18). Aaron Maresky, 11, was diagnosed with severe Crohn's disease when he was seven years old and lives with intense pain every day. It is beyond me why OHIP does not fund these medications. Crohn's disease is utter torture to those suffering from it. Aaron knows the extent to which chronically ill kids and their families suffer across the city. I'm a 15-year-old boy who strongly supports Aaron's charity because he suffers and knows at such a young age that families will benefit once people raise money and join him in the cause.

Gaza's deadly impact in a southern Israeli town

Mitch Ginsburg
The Times of Israel

We left Jerusalem as though on a class trip – with packed lunches and reserved seats on the bus – and found ourselves, within an hour, at the foot of blood-stained stairs on Baal Shem Tov Street, in Kiryat Malachi, where a pregnant woman and two male neighbours were killed last Thursday morning. They were the first three casualties of Israel's ongoing operation against Hamas and the terror organizations in Gaza.

The trip was organized by the Israeli government press office. The agenda was clear: to show journalists how Israelis suffer by virtue of their proximity to Hamas-ruled Gaza. But the agenda needed no advancement beyond transportation.

The stores were shut, the streets quiet. On a beautiful cloudless day in the south of Israel, the trail of the terrorists' rockets lingered for many minutes in the blue sky, arched like rainbows. In a playground without children, clusters of border police, in their grey-green uniforms, stood out against the bright red playground toys.

According to Israel Defence Forces figures, some 300 rockets (at the time of this writing last Thursday) had been fired at Israeli civilian centres since the airstrike on Nov. 14 that killed Hamas military commander Ahmed Jabari.

"Even animals aren't treated this way," said Efraim Amram, a middle-aged father of four and a longtime resident of Kiryat Malachi. "They intentionally target civilians."

Amram called Operation Pillar of Defence "a war for our survival" and advocated strongly for the sort of ground operation in Gaza that would topple the Hamas regime. "That's the only medicine that will work," he said.

Kiryat Malachi is a small city of 20,000 – and it all too frequently is in the news for the wrong reasons. The current mayor is being investigated for rape charges. The former mayor and president is serving a prison term for rape. And the annual police crime report from 2010 ranks the city first in the country in break-ins per 1,000 homes.

None of this, though, was evident in the grief-stricken pocket of the city known as the Chabad neighbourhood.

Neria Shmalow, a Chabad Lubavitch Chassid and a native of Uzbekistan, stood outside the wrecked apartment building, leaning on a pillar in the shade, alternating between stroking his beard and pulling on his cigarette.

Shortly after eight in the morning, he heard a series of air raid sirens, perhaps as many as 10. His wife had already left for work and he, an employee at a factory that makes wet wipes, remained at home with his four children, aged three to 12. When the Grad rocket that killed Mira Sharf, Aharon Smadga and Itzik Amsalem slammed into the building next to his, he felt the ground shake and heard glass shatter. It took him several moments to realize that the shards had fallen from his own windows.

The apartment in Kiryat Malachi that was struck by the rocket.

He said that he wanted the "root of the problem" treated in Gaza and suggested something akin to what the Russian army has done in Chechnya. "So that they'll think not once but a thousand times before firing on us," he said.

His neighbour, Meni Azriel, also a Lubavitch Chassid, heard the two impacts on Baal Shem Tov Street and ran to his motorbike. Azriel is a volunteer for ZAKA, an organization that treats victims and, in the case of a fatality, ensures that all body parts are brought to a proper burial. In his 11 years of service, he has arrived early on the scene of dozens of accidents, he said, but the sights that he encountered Thursday morning, when the fire department piled open the door to the apartment on the fourth floor, were the worst he has ever seen.

Azriel did not describe what he saw, but said, in a soft voice, that knowing the victims made the task infinitely more difficult. Smadga, 49, at the time of his death, was a personal friend of his. Smadga had tried for years to have children and finally was able to father twins and a little girl. After the first rocket salvo, Smadga had gone to warn Sharf, 26, to come into the stairwell, where it was safer, but was struck by the rocket while in her apartment. She was pregnant. A mother of three, she was on a break from a Lubavitch posting in India. The third victim, Amsalem, 24, Azriel knew only as a young married man.

At the foot of the stairs, there was a bloodstain on the earth-coloured wall. On the third floor, the window's shards had been blown out the door and the Jewish study books had been gathered off the floor and hastily stacked on a table. Wet laundry hung in the poorly lit stairwell. Every stair was stained with blood. And on the fourth floor, where the three people were killed, the apartment was in ruins, and though British Ambassador Matthew Gould mentioned seeing "blood on a child's mattress," I didn't advance beyond the doorway.

By the time we arrived in Ashkelon, 22 rockets had been fired at the city, 18 of which had been shot down by Iron Dome, according to a home-front defence officer in the city.

A young woman named Paz Azran, 17, who had recently met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and has lived in the city her entire life, said, "I don't really remember what living without rockets is like."

Just as she was saying that life under rocket fire "is really extremely scary" – her grandmother beaming as she spoke to a gaggle of foreign reporters in admirable English – the siren went off. "You don't need to run," said Azran, "you have 30 seconds. Just walk fast."

The bomb shelter showed all the signs of a city used to life under fire. The floors were made of parquet. The far wall was covered in mirrors. Azran said she had taken ballet lessons in the shelter as a child.

After years of living with rocket fire, she said, "There is no such thing" as no one injured from a rocket attack. "Every bang on the street sends people running, and every slammed door in school sends them under their desks."

She, too, hoped the current IDF operation would go on for considerably longer and provide a much-needed shift in the status quo.

Mira Sharf and Aharon Smadga were buried in Jerusalem and Kiryat Malachi respectively last Thursday. Itzik Amsalem was laid to rest in Kiryat Malachi. As the funeral for Smadga got underway, attendees had to drop to the ground because rocket-alert sirens wailed.

Successor to 'martyr' Jabari appointed

INS.org

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian media lead with headlines praising Hamas terrorist chief Ahmed Jabari's "martyrdom," the day after his targeted killing.

Jabari, who was killed last Wednesday, has a long history of involvement in terrorism against Israeli civilians.

According to Palestinian Media Watch (PMW), the Palestinian Authority's official newspaper, Al-Hayat Al-Jadida, referred to Jabari's death as "shahada, martyrdom death for Allah, calling it "the crowning achievement of his life of struggle" and

"his self-sacrificing actions [that is, terror attacks] will be told for generations to come and will be eternalized in memory."

PA President Mahmoud Abbas has demanded that "Arab countries in the [UN] Security Council discuss courses of action to end the [Israeli] aggression."

The PA's support for Jabari comes despite his position as part of its rival, Hamas. The PA broke with Hamas in 2006 after Hamas forces ousted the PA from Gaza in a bloody coup d'état. Meanwhile, in Gaza, tens of thousands took to the streets for Jabari's funeral procession from Gaza's Omari Mosque, according to the Times of Israel.

Referred to by Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak as the "the military chief of staff of Hamas," Jabari played a key role in several terrorist attacks against Israel, including a 1998 terror attack on a school bus that killed two Israeli children.

In 2002, Jabari took over as commander of Hamas' military wing after the former commander was injured in an Israeli strike. In 2006, Jabari directed the capture of kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit.

In a 2006 interview with Al Jazeera on the targeting of civilians, Jabari said, "The Jew who comes to the soil of Palestine... is fighting us, and we will fight him and kill him," according to PMW.

Later, Jabari received praise from Hamas' hardline leadership for his role in securing the release of 1,000 Palestinian prisoners in exchange for Shalit in 2011.

Meanwhile, Hamas' military wing announced a successor to Jabari and promised deadly surprises for Israel.

The new commander of Hamas' Izzeddine al-Qassam Brigades is Marwan Abed Khareem Issa, 48, a native Gazan from Jabaliyya. Issa served as Jabari's deputy for years, and commanded special units in Islamic Jihad's military wing, according to Israel Hayom.

Obama's America needs some grounding

Elections are fabulous launching pads, sending messages to the government and the people. In the long, arduous but illuminating American election campaign that just passed, we learned a lot about American Jewry, about the American people, and about the modern democratic process. All these are relevant lessons for Canadians.

Once again, we learned that American Jews are more pro-choice than pro-Israel, that they are more motivated by liberal ideology than Zionist ideology and more by domestic concerns than foreign policy issues, including Israel, at the ballot box. This phenomenon is a tribute to just how American, and at home, most American Jews feel. They enjoy the warm, historic welcome they have received from civil democratic societies such as the United States and Canada, and they respond by taking their civic duties very seriously.

We also learned that the American Jewish community is echoing the divided general community. Just as the American political world is being polarized, just as extreme language is polluting American political discourse, so, too, we are seeing more and more polarization, more and more demagoguery, in American Jewry – although in the general community we see more of a 50-50 split and among Jews we see a 70-30 split. “Red Jews” constitute about one-third of the American Jewish electorate and tend to be more conservative politically, more Orthodox religiously, with a sprinkling of less secular Russians and recent immigrants thrown in. “Blue Jews” are the majority, overwhelmingly cosmopolitan, liberal and increasingly secular. This split isn’t a geographic phenomenon, but an ideological, sociological and religious one.

Gil TROY

It’s no secret that the American people are divided. This election was decided in 10 battleground states, and the small percentage difference in the popular vote spoke volumes. Moreover, the rhetoric was heated, the enmity great and the disappointment intense, because the Republicans came so close to winning. In fact, the conventional wisdom is correct. This was a year the Republicans should have won – and Mitt Romney and his loud, shrill, close-minded party lost the campaign more than President Barack Obama won it.

This election very much came down to identity politics. People on Election Day voted in groups, as women, as African-Americans, as Hispanics, as gays and lesbians, as young people, and as white men. And the white men lost. Barack Obama’s America – Obamerica – is a new America. Obamerica is multiracial, not just white. It has many religions and many secularists, not just Protestants. It has many different forms of living arrangements, not just mom and dad, 2.2 kids, the white picket fence and the suburban garage. It’s multicultural, multiethnic, less monolithic and more diverse sociologically, ideologically and politically.

Had Obama lost, his 2008 victory could have been dismissed as an Obamanomaly, a fluke – or, more accurately, a premature warning. But the new America that Obama represents and leads was best illustrated in the competing optics of the two political party conventions this summer. The Republican convention looked like a Midwestern church social – overwhelmingly white, square and traditional. The Democratic convention looked like an urban club scene – multiracial, hip and progressive.

The numbers on Election Day confirmed this. Obama’s army of African-Americans, Hispanic-Americans, young Americans, well-educated Americans, and women triumphed over Romney’s white-bread coalition of the well-bred – and their wannabes.

America is not just changing, Canada and the world are also changing. The United States is becoming more open, more tolerant – sociologist Alan Wolfe says the 11th commandment in modern society is “Thou shalt not judge thy neighbour.” But there’s a danger, as my mother taught that if we are so open-minded, our brains will fall out.

I’m proud of the new openness, the new acceptance. But it comes with a new selfishness, a new disengagement from community, a new distance from defining values and core beliefs. I applaud Obamerica as a vital, dynamic, multiracial, multicultural dynamic. But as Americans, as Jews and as Canadians, we have to worry that it – and other western democracies – does not become a Republic of Nothing.

We need to jettison old prejudices, but not all of our old beliefs. Some traditions were bad, but others were anchoring, ennobling and inspiring. We can’t make history and tradition a set of handcuffs, stopping us from changing, growing and flourishing. But to stand, we need some gravity. We need some grounding.

Provoking change at the Wall

A well-known and well-respected member of the Reform Jewish community comes to your Orthodox synagogue in Toronto. From the women’s side of the mechitzah, she says the Shema out loud. She is promptly and publicly arrested by police officers paid by the Canadian government. She’s thrown in a Toronto jail, strip-searched and placed in a cell with prostitutes and thieves.

The Toronto Jewish community and the Canadian government claim she “asked for it” and deserved to be arrested and punished. Pray out loud? Clearly a provocation. Your rabbi publishes an article saying she only did it for the publicity.

Is this scenario possible? It happened at the Kotel when Anat Hoffman, executive director of Israel Religious Action Centre and respected member of the Reform community in Jerusalem, was arrested for saying the Shema out loud at the monthly Rosh Chodesh service of Women of the Wall, a group of Orthodox, Reform and Conservative women who gather each month to do something any other Jew might do – pray at the Wall. But they infuriate people because some wear tallitot, although they’re “hidden” so as not to arouse the authorities, and they pray as a group. Called every despicable name – Amalek, Nazis, whores – by men on the other side, sometimes ducking chairs being thrown over the holy Wall at them, they continue to sing Hallel.

Israel’s response? A group of Reform rabbis from across Canada met with a highly placed Israeli official in Ottawa earlier this month, and when we asked for an investigation of the incident, the official explained condescendingly that Hoffman was “disrespectful” and “a provocateur,” and the incident is minor and unimportant. The official is a secular Jew and suggested that we need to “understand” that “Israel is an Orthodox country.” I always thought Israel was a Jewish country.

As letters to the editor in this newspaper pointed out, the story of her arrest appeared in the back of the paper the same week the front-page story carried blessings from the rabbi of the Kotel, saying, “Every Jewish child should have his bar mitzvah at the Kotel.” Every Jewish child? Including your daughter? Or does the word Jew not include women? Decrying the “incident” in an article last week – not Hoffman’s arrest, mind you, but her praying out loud – he repeated the tired canard that women who pray this way at the Kotel are doing it only for show, as a political demonstration.

Does he look into the heart and motivation of every tourist, Jewish and non-Jewish, who disgorges from their bus for an instant to “pray” at the Wall? Does he ask each secular Israeli bar mitzvah kid marched down to the Kotel with trumpets and drums whether it’s a show? Or only those Jewish women who awake at 6 a.m. each and every month to pray at the Kotel on Rosh Chodesh?

The Kotel is officially an Orthodox synagogue, the only ancient site in Israel to be declared as such – a response to Women of the Wall’s request to pray with tallitot there. But even if we accept that, I have donned my tallit at many Orthodox synagogues in the Diaspora, and never once have I been afraid of being arrested. I might be politely asked to remove it, or stared at, or even given dirty looks, though mostly I have encountered only polite inquiries. I don’t expect to be thrown in jail.

The alternatives? 1. Remove the Kotel’s “religious” designation, release it from the hold of the rabbinate (and the state-funded rabbi of the Wall) and declare it a public site under the Ministry of Antiquities, like any other ancient site in Israel, be it Masada, Tzipori, Beit Shean, etc. Once it’s a non-religious site, disallow any minyan of any denomination to pray there. 2. Declare it a religious site for all Jews, not an Orthodox synagogue, and allow non-Orthodox Jews to have their minyan there as they wish. That’s called democracy. 3. Declare it a trans-denominational synagogue and share the space daily: Sunday for Orthodox prayers, Monday Conservative, Tuesday Reform, and so on. Kind of like the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which houses many Christian denominations, all of which schedule their particular sect’s services at different times. You don’t like one way of davening? Don’t come on that day.

Or, keep on arresting Jews who go there to pray with sincerity, but happen to be women.

The Roy Farran affair

Sometimes, a seemingly insignificant incident can cause a monumental ripple effect. Such was the case when a 16-year-old Jewish boy, Alexander Rubowitz, disappeared in Jerusalem's Mea Shearim district on May 6, 1947 while out on an errand.

Rubowitz, in fact, was abducted and murdered by British commandos in the waning days of the Mandate, the British colonial period in Palestine. The resultant scandal drove a wedge between Britain and the Jewish community, undermined British prestige and authority and was a factor in Britain's decision to divest itself of its League of Nations mandate in Palestine.

British historian David Cesarani examines this incident in an important book, Major Farran's Hat: Murder, Scandal and Britain's War Against Jewish Terrorism 1945-1948, published by Vintage Books in London.

The surname in its title is a reference to Roy Farran, a highly-decorated officer who was in charge of a covert counter-terrorist squad whose mission was to hunt down Jewish terrorists who opposed British rule in Palestine by means of violence and sought to create a Jewish state there.

Rubowitz, after whom a street in Jerusalem has been named, was a member of a religious youth group aligned with the Fighters for the Freedom of Israel, known by its Hebrew acronym as Lehi. When he was kidnapped, he was on an errand for Lehi, which routinely used teenagers as couriers to distribute leaflets as well as arms.

Among Jewish militias in Palestine, Lehi was the most radical, having been formed after its first leader, Avraham Stern, broke away from the Irgun, the National Military Organization, which itself was more militant than the mainstream Haganah force.

After Stern was killed by British police in 1942, Lehi regrouped under the leadership of Nathan Friedman-Yellin and launched a series of assassinations aimed at British officials and soldiers.

One of its prime targets, Lord Moyne, was killed in 1944. He was Britain's top diplomat in the Middle East and a personal friend of the prime minister, Winston Churchill, who was friendly to the Zionist enterprise. Moyne's assassination appalled the Jewish Agency and prompted the Haganah to help British anti-terror teams track down Lehi fighters.

By 1947, Lehi and the Irgun had declared war against Britain, having attacked British forces and bases in Palestine and having bombed the King David Hotel in Jerusalem, with the loss of 96 lives, including 16 British personnel.

Sheldon Kirshner

It was against this backdrop that Rubowitz was waylaid by Farran and four other members of his team. They took him to a secluded spot for interrogation, hoping he could lead them to what Cesarani describes as "bigger fish." Rubowitz had nothing to tell them, and in a rage, Farran smashed his head repeatedly with a rock, killing him. Rubowitz's body never turned up, but Farran's hat, with his name written in ink on the sweatband, was found at the scene of the homicide.

Farran was no ordinary soldier, having earned recognition for conducting special operations behind German lines during World War II. After the war, he was assigned to one of the two units that had been established by the Palestine Police Force to arrest Jewish terrorists.

Cesarani says that Farran approached the Arab-Israeli conflict with an open mind, but once in Palestine, he developed mixed impressions of Jews and bridled at the restraints imposed on the British army to combat terrorism.

Farran was summoned to Palestine in 1947, just as Arab-Jewish hostilities escalated and the British army launched strikes against Lehi and the Irgun.

British authorities, though aware that Rubowitz had been murdered, denied any knowledge of his murder in a systematic coverup. Police and army spokesmen stuck to their story, even after Farran's hat turned up.

The boy's disappearance aroused indignation and anger in the Yishuv, with the Jewish press taking up his cause and demanding to know why Farran had not been arrested. Eventually, he was detained. But convinced he could bargain his way out of trouble if given sufficient time, he fled to neighbouring Syria, his flight being front page news in Palestine and Britain.

Lured back to Palestine, Farran was thrown into a British military prison. Shortly afterward, the British announced that he would be court martialled. Farran was acquitted, flown to a British base in Egypt and placed on a ship bound for Liverpool.

Toward the end of 1947, when the United Nations voted to partition Palestine, Farran resigned from the army. He wrote an article for the Daily Express in which he outlined his views on the conflict in Palestine.

His sympathies lying with the Arabs, Farran described the Zionist movement as a "poisonous flower" and accused Jews of aspiring to control the Middle East. "Small wonder that the nations of the Middle East regard aggressive Zionism as a menace to their security," he observed.

Concluding that Jews had become a "bellicose nationalistic race," Farran prophesied that the Zionists would be defeated and that antisemitism in Britain would increase.

Farran's fortunes soared. He wrote a book, Winged Dagger, the paperback edition of which is on sale on Amazon.com today, and was feted by King George VI at Buckingham Palace. Farran worked for a construction company in Scotland, not realizing he was being stalked by Lehi.

On May 3, 1948, less than two weeks before Israel declared independence, a parcel was delivered to Farran's house, killing his brother, Rex. Lehi claimed responsibility, admitting Rex Farran had been killed in error. Three months later, Farran left Britain to manage the affairs of a British construction company in Rhodesia.

There he met a Canadian, Ruth Ardern, whose family had a ranch in Alberta.

Roy Farran, right, in London, circa 1947

Married in 1950, they settled in Calgary. Intending to be a dairy farmer, he instead wrote a novel, Jungle Chase, and a history of the Calgary Highlanders Regiment. That led to a job as a reporter on the Calgary Herald. In 1954, he founded a weekly newspaper, the North Hills News, which was his springboard to politics.

Elected a city alderman in 1961, Farran won a seat in Alberta's legislature 10 years later, running under the banner of the Progressive Conservative party. He landed in the provincial cabinet in 1973 as minister for telephones and utilities and in 1975 as solicitor-general. He retired from politics in 1979 as a much-liked and respected elder statesman.

The Rubowitz family continued to pursue Farran, trying to mine information from him about the whereabouts of Alexander's corpse. Farran declined to respond, and from the 1970s onward, he refused to speak about his abduction. Farran died in 2006.

The Farran affair, which began as a minor event and mushroomed into an international cause celebre, is little more than a footnote in the larger scheme of things. But it helped delegitimize Britain's claim to governing Palestine and set the stage for Israel's emergence as a sovereign state.

Call it blowback.

iConference focuses on issues facing Israel

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

The founder of HonestReporting Canada spoke at a recent conference aimed at young people, addressing the misrepresentation of Israel in mainstream media.

"The main focus of my work is to hold the media and its reporters accountable for the news they produce," said Mike Fogelman at the iConference, held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto on Nov. 11. The event aimed to help participants understand issues facing Israel today.

"Public opinion is largely shaped through the media, so misleading news can be a huge problem," Fogelman added.

HonestReporting is a grassroots organization that promotes fairness and accuracy in Canadian media coverage of Israel and the Middle East.

Media bias often accounts for inaccurate reporting of Israeli and Middle East issues, Fogelman said.

HonestReporting uses media analysis to ensure that all news reports focusing on the Middle East present an accurate picture of what is happening in the region, he said. The organization also trains young activists to analyze the media themselves.

"The first thing you want to take notice of in any news reports is whether the facts are accurate and objective," Fogelman said.

Next, readers should determine whether the news report uses proper terms and definitions, and ensure that the information is factual, rather than an opinion. "Compare a few different outlets and look at statistics and opinions on the same issue," he said.

Readers should also take into the account the context of the news report. "Often, complex issues that go back many years are summarized in under 1,000 words," said Fogelman. "This can result in a misunderstanding. A good piece of news will include the necessary background information. When important facts are left out, you have to wonder if it was intentional."

Fogelman encourages all activists to be informed about the current issues in the Middle East, so they can help monitor the media and not accept everything they read as the truth. "Google the history of the issue, contact the sources of a report. Do whatever you need to do to have an educated and impartial view of the issue."

Richard Bass, founder of the JEd Institute, discussed the "commonly misunderstood ideal" of the two-state solution. This is one of the issues focused on by JEd. The institute – whose website states that it aims to change the landscape of Jewish education so that all Jewish students possess the knowledge to informatively debate the truth about Israel and the Jewish People – offers education modules that cover a wide variety of topics on Judaism and Israel.

Bass' multimedia presentation gave a brief history of Israel and the origins of the idea of a two-state solution. He urged conference attendees to think about whether this was a reasonable solution considering the issues in Israel today.

"In theory a two-state solution is possible, but not in the mainstream way its discussed today," he said. "We need to figure if it's reasonable to believe that this could lead to peace and security."

Bass said this issue is too complex to be summarized in a brief presentation and invited all attendees to participate in ongoing discussions at the JEd Institute.

The final panellist, Rabbi Ken Spiro, spoke about how antisemitism differs from other types of hatred, prejudice and persecution. Rabbi Spiro, a senior lecturer and researcher for Aish HaTorah's Discovery Seminars and the Jerusalem Online University, said the world puts Israel in a different category than any other country in the world. "Israel bashing is the only cause that unites cultures that are natural enemies," he said.

But, instead of letting that depress him, Rabbi Spiro noted that Jews have overcome persecution for many years and will continue to do so. "I believe its all part of our mission to come together as a unique group," he said. "Being Jewish may not always be comfortable, but it is always meaningful."

Going Gold – Kol HaKavod!

Kol Hakavod to Noam Gershoni for his inspirational and monumental achievement!

Noam, 28, a former Apache Helicopter pilot, who was critically wounded during the Second Lebanon War, won a gold medal in wheelchair tennis at the 2012 London Paralympics.

Noam's accomplishments are even more heroic, given the challenges that he has faced in his young life. During the Second Lebanon War, Noam was severely wounded in his spinal cord, arms and legs when the helicopter he was flying crashed into another helicopter and plummeted to the ground.

After many months of hospitalization and rehabilitation, Noam visited Beit Halochem Tel Aviv, and remembers being captivated by the wheelchair tennis program there. He had never played before and decided to give it a try.

"I began playing wheelchair tennis for the fun of it but didn't think for one moment I'd make it to such high levels."

"Noam stood out from the very first of his training sessions and it was clear we were dealing with a very talented young man. Three times a week, he trains hard, works out at the fitness hall and receives specialized physiotherapy," says his Beit Halochem coach, Nimrod Bichler.

Noam's determination and devotion led him to win a gold medal after only four years of playing. Noam credits the dedication of the coaches and staff at Beit Halochem for his success at the Paralympics.

Beit Halochem Centres in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem, Nahariya and Beer Sheva offer a broad array of specialized therapies, sports programs, cultural and social activities enabling our 51,000 Wounded Heroes to return to meaningful and productive lives.

This summer, Noam Gershoni won a gold medal in the men's singles quad tennis tournament at the 2012 Paralympic Games in London. Noam trains three times a week at Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv and also receives physiotherapy there.

Please ASSIST the more than 51,000 disabled war veterans and victims of terror who turn to Beit Halochem for their rehabilitation.

Mazon Canada has fed the hungry for 25 years

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Mazon Canada, the national Jewish response to hunger, started 25 years ago as a temporary fix to feeding those in need of help.

Today, the need is greater than it was then, says Ida McLaughlin, Mazon's national executive director.

"We started with allocations of $10,000, and in 25 years, we have allocated $7 million to front-line organizations that battle hunger. That's an extraordinary amount."

Mazon's mandate, she said, is to fund only those organizations that have as their primary concern the relief of hunger, or those that have a distinct program specifically targeted to an identifiable group suffering from hunger.

Organizations Mazon helps include food banks, synagogues and churches, schools and community centres across the country.

The seeds for Mazon Canada were planted, McLaughlin said, when Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, now rabbi emeritus of Temple Emanu-El in Toronto, heard about the work of Leonard Fein, who founded Mazon in the United States in 1985 as a result of the famine in Ethiopia.

Fein's approach was to apply the three per cent principle, she said. "This means we ask our supporters to donate three per cent of the food costs of any simchah or milestone event so Mazon can allocate those funds to the hungry."

The organization encouraged the community to symbolically invite a hungry stranger to their table, and it later branched out to special events, appeals at holidays and the sale of occasion cards, she said.

"We still live by the original tenet of considering those who don't have, and including them in our everyday lives."

The community's need comes down to the housing crisis and unemployment, she said. "There is a lot of instability in people's lives. Their home may be paid for, but what about feeding their children? Sometimes they have no choice but to give up healthy eating."

The need is still so great, McLaughlin said, that they have to turn away agencies that have asked for help. "It is difficult to choose, but we try to help out grass-roots organizations. Before they get funds, we ensure that they have a charitable status, and that everything else is above board. It breaks our hearts, though, when we have to turn people away. Our job is to feed the hungry. We don't like to leave people out."

Ida McLaughlin

McLaughlin, who comes to Mazon from a managerial position at TD Bank, has "always been involved in food security. I have volunteered for a charity that takes care of seniors and the disabled, and feeding people in need has always been a priority for me. It is an issue I feel deeply about. I am honoured to be part of an organization that has its priorities straight."

To commemorate Mazon Canada's 25th anniversary, the organization is holding a fundraising event at Roy Thomson Hall, Nov. 27, at 6 p.m. The evening includes kosher food prepared by caterers, vintners and pastry artists, live entertainment, a silent auction and a short presentation to honour the organization's founders.

Fire destroys Thornhill Woods Chabad centre

The Chabad Russian Center basement shul after the Nov. 9 fire

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A fire at the Chabad Russian Center of Thornhill Woods at 8808 Bathurst St. has rendered it unusable and destroyed its makeshift basement shul.

The Nov. 9 blaze occurred somewhere between 1 and 4 p.m. and claimed the centre's Torah scroll, numerous chumashim and related prayer materials, according to Chanie Hildeshaim, the centre's co-director.

Hildeshaim, wife of Rabbi Chaim Hildeshaim, the centre's spiritual leader, told The C/N that the fire likely started as a result of an electrical short circuit and the fire department doesn't suspect arson.

The centre, a converted bungalow on the southwest corner of Bathurst Street and Autumn Hill Boulevard, is the former home of the now-defunct Ohr Menachem Academy. Chabad rents it from the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Ontario (JRCC), which owns the lot.

The Hildeshaims had hoped to raise enough money to buy the land from the JRCC and expand the centre to accommodate its rapidly growing membership, she said.

About 60 to 100 people attend its Shabbat services each week, the rebbitzen said. The centre has "a few hundred families who would consider themselves members of the shul" though not all are paying members, she added.

Prior to the fire, the couple estimated that the land would cost about $2 million to purchase and "a few million more" to build a proper building and synagogue.

Now, she said, it remains unclear how much it might cost to rebuild, as the basement has to be "gutted" to determine the extent of the heat damage to essential piping and the building's foundation.

In the meantime, the Hildeshaims are hosting daily prayer services and programming at their nearby home and are also renting space at the North Thornhill Community Centre for various programs.

They're asking for donations to the centre's fire relief fund to help with the rebuilding effort and with replacing "all synagogue essentials."

"We want community members to know that this fire is not going to stop us," the rebbitzen said. "This is a lesson to us that we have to get stronger. Members for years have been saying we need more space. But we need the community's help. We need money to rebuild and for a long-term solution and build a building fitting for our community. Let's build a shul the way a shul should be."

Incoming Holocaust body chair visits Toronto

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Canada is committed to memorializing the Holocaust in all its nuances, says Mario Silva, the incoming chair of the Task Force for International Cooperation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research, known as the ITF.

Silva, who officially assumes his position in a ceremony in Berlin next March, was recently in Toronto to meet officials of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, including Fran Sonshine, the national chair, and Yaron Ashkenazi, the executive director.

He informed them of initiatives Canada intends to take in 2013.

Established in 1998, the ITF is the only inter-governmental body devoted exclusively to the memory of the Holocaust.

Composed of 31 member states from Argentina and Germany to Israel and the United States, the ITF has granted observer status to three nations: Turkey, Portugal and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

Membership is open to any country, but a nation can only join after meeting ITF requirements. Members must create a national day for Holocaust remembrance, open their archives to researchers and make a public policy commitment to Holocaust education.

Silva – a legal scholar and a former Liberal party member of Parliament who represented the downtown Toronto riding of Davenport from 2004 to 2011 – was appointed by Prime Minister Stephen Harper to be Canada's representative at the ITF, which Canada joined three years ago.

As an MP Silva served on a subcommittee charged with monitoring the state of international human rights, and was vice-chair of the steering committee of the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Antisemitism.

Currently, Canada is pursuing initiatives in three key areas, said Silva, who holds a master's degree in international human rights from Oxford University and a PhD in law from the National University of Ireland.

In education, Canada is working with three organizations – the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre in Toronto, the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre and the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre – to preserve Holocaust survivor testimony, said Silva, who works closely with Jason Kenny, the minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism.

"We expect further details will be forthcoming in early 2013," Silva said in an interview.

Canada is also considering projects to engage students and teachers in Holocaust education, he added. Here, too, details will be announced early next year.

With respect to remembrance, Canada Post will release a commemorative stamp on Jan. 17, 2013, to honour Raoul Wallenberg, the Swede who helped save about 100,000 Hungarian Jews in Nazi-occupied Budapest.

Where research is concerned, Citizenship and Immigration Canada has partnered with Library and Archives Canada to develop a research guide on Canada's holdings on the Holocaust.

"The ITF is committed to ensuring open access to archival materials related to the Holocaust, and although Canada's archives are already open, we hope that this guide will further support Canadian students and researchers studying the Holocaust," said Silva.

Asked what Canada has already done in Holocaust remembrance, Silva replied, "The government, under the auspices of Foreign Minister John Baird, is working to establish a National Holocaust Monument in Ottawa."

Legislation to build a monument received royal assent two years ago, and currently, a development council is trying to secure the required funding, he noted.

Mario Silva

As well, a Community Historical Recognition Program, funded by the department of citizenship and immigration, has provided more than $2.5 million to projects that commemorate the experiences of Canadian Jews under Canada's restrictive immigration policies during World War II.

Another project raises awareness of the internment of 2,000 European Jewish refugees as enemy aliens in camps in Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick during the war.

A third project tells the story of the St. Louis, a German cruise ship whose Jewish passengers were refused admittance to Canada and the United States in 1939.

Silva said that since the signing of the Stockholm Declaration in 2000, the ITF's foundational document, international organizations such as the Council of Europe and the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe have made Holocaust remembrance "a fundamental part of their mission."

He said Canada will work with countries interested in joining the ITF.

In closing, Silva said he has worked co-operatively with Canadian Jewish organizations and Jewish communal leaders since the announcement of his appointment.

"I have been inspired by their dedication and passion for Holocaust education," he said. "I am looking forward to continuing to work closely with the Canadian Jewish community throughout my chair year."

Holocaust heroism took various forms: historian

Director of Yad Vashem Library visits Toronto

Robert Rozett

Jewish heroism during the Holocaust was expressed not only through armed resistance to the Nazis, but through non-violent means as well, says an Israeli historian.

Heroism manifested itself through the preservation of human dignity among oppressed Jews and through acts of rescue on the part of non-Jews, noted Robert Rozett, the co-author of a forthcoming book with Avraham Milgrom on the subject, and the director of the Yad Vashem Library in Jerusalem.

Rozett's book – which he describes as a “documentary reader” – is based on letters and diaries produced by Jews during the Holocaust.

It will be the first volume of its kind, said Rozett, who was in Toronto recently at the invitation of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

“Heroism is not just armed resistance,” said Rozett, the son of Holocaust survivors from Hungary who was born in the United States and made aliyah in 1978. “Heroism is also the spiritual courage that enabled Jews to wear the ‘Nazi’ yellow star and Jewish women to keep their families together against all odds. It's a different kind of heroism.”

Rozett's still untitled book, which will be published in 2013 by Yad Vashem and Israel's Knesset, will at first appear in Hebrew and then, possibly, in English.

Among the rescuers he discusses is Raoul Wallenberg, the legendary Swede who is credited with having saved 100,000 Jews in Nazi-occupied Budapest from 1944 onward.

In fact, Wallenberg acted in conjunction with a host of other rescuers, said Rozett, who, under the supervision of eminent scholar Yehuda Bauer, wrote his PhD thesis on Jewish rescue and revolt in Slovakia and Hungary.

“About a dozen or more people were involved in the rescue of Hungarian Jews in Budapest, including the Swiss consul, the Vatican representative, the honorary Spanish consul, and the Red Cross.”

As for armed resistance, Rozett said that revolts broke out in about 12 cities in Poland and Lithuania, including Warsaw, Vilna and Bialystok.

Revolts were planned in other localities, but were not carried out, he added.

Jewish resistance was only effective when it was connected to a larger non-Jewish revolt, he said, citing the 1944 Slovak rebellion. Rozett – a graduate of Hebrew University's Institute for Contemporary Jewry – said that Holocaust denial is all the more serious when it is linked to a campaign delegitimizing Israel.

In his estimation, Holocaust denial has become a mainstream concept in the Muslim and Arab worlds, with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad being one of its most outspoken proponents.

Israeli politicians who evoke the Holocaust for political ends feed into criticism that Israel exploits the Holocaust, he said.

“We'd like people in the public domain to be careful about what they say. But it's germane to talk about Jewish history. The Holocaust belongs in public, but it depends how it is used.”

Yad Vashem's library is probably the biggest of its kind, containing 130,000 titles in 54 languages, primarily in English and German, said Rozett, who has been its director for the past 18 years.

Among the publications are 1,300 yizkor books from Jewish communities destroyed by the Nazis and 9,000 memoirs written by Holocaust survivors.

Each year, about 4,000 titles, some on Jewish life and identity, are added to the collection. In the interests of comprehensiveness, the library collects Holocaust denial literature, too. “Not all suppliers want to deal with that material,” he said.

The library also stocks German publications from the Nazi era and Jewish newspapers and journals from the Holocaust period.

Catholic theologian fosters dialogue in Poland

Jewish-Christian relations on the agenda

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A Polish Catholic theologian and editor who did not meet a Jew until he was well into adulthood is now playing a major role in building consciousness about Poland's Jewish past and present and fostering Jewish-Christian dialogue in Poland.

"I knew nothing about Jews, nothing," acknowledged Zbigniew Nosowski, a resident of Otwock, a town near Warsaw, and editor-in-chief of Wieża, a leading Roman Catholic intellectual monthly.

"It took me 20 years to realize that Jews are not just historical figures, but living people," added Nosowski, who was in Toronto recently at the invitation of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada and the consulate general of Poland.

He spoke at St. Michael's College, at one of the final events of Holocaust Education Week.

Nosowski, 50, was born in Otwock, which was 60 per cent Jewish on the eve of World War II. In the summer of 1942, the Nazis liquidated the ghetto and deported its Jewish inhabitants to the Treblinka extermination camp.

Nosowski was raised in a traditional and insular Catholic family whose home was across the street from the house of Irena Sendler, a social worker who helped save about 2,000 Polish Jews during the Nazi occupation and was later recognized as a Righteous Gentile by Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial museum in Jerusalem.

Despite the long Jewish presence in Otwock, Nosowski was taught to believe that Poland had always been ethnically and religiously homogeneous, and that "others" had been responsible for its problems.

He began to reassess his views in the late 1980s, following a visit to Otwock's neglected Jewish cemetery and a reading of the biblical Book of Exodus, which opened his eyes to Christianity's Jewish roots.

Since then, Nosowski, a graduate of the Theological Academy in Warsaw, has been actively involved in Polish-Jewish affairs. Today, he is deputy chair of the Polish Council of Christians and Jews, chair of the Citizens' Committee for Remembrance of the Jews of Otwock and Karczew and a member of the Council of the Auschwitz-Birkenau Foundation.

Having been converted to ecumenism, he said, "Without understanding the Jewish roots of Christianity, I can't understand my Catholic faith."

Nor can he truly understand the history of Otwock without taking its Jewish dimension into account, he noted.

Poland is a good place for interfaith dialogue because of its importance in Polish and Jewish history and its past as a multicultural haven of toleration and peaceful coexistence, he said, equating Polishness with pluralism.

The growing interest among Catholics in Jews is not merely a passing fad, he claimed, likening the death of three million Polish Jews during the Holocaust to the amputation of a limb.

In a reference to contemporary Poland, he said, "We, as Catholics, should be more supportive of the Jewish community and its revival."

Claiming that memory can be harnessed as a bond between Jews and Catholics, Nosowski talked about initiatives he and colleagues have taken in recent years to memorialize the loss of some three million Jews in Poland.

Since 1998, the Catholic Church has annually observed the Day of Judaism on Jan. 17 in churches throughout the country.

The church also marks the holiday of Simchat Torah. In 2002, on the 60th anniversary of the deportation of its Jewish population, Otwock held its first annual remembrance march.

A website (www.guardiansofmemory.com) promotes Polish-Jewish remembrance, which includes the restoration of Jewish cemeteries and synagogues.

Since Polish-Jewish dialogue in Poland is only two generations old and thus still "something new," it will require further effort and patience in the future, he said.

According to Nosowski, Jews and Catholics have yet to resolve what he described as "difficult and painful issues." He did not elaborate.

Zionism needs to be about love, not fear, rabbi says

Vicki Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Rabbi Daniel Gordis doesn't like what he hears when North Americans talk about Israel.

"I think if somebody were to eavesdrop in your home or in your inbox, that 85 per cent of the time that you're talking, thinking or reading about Israel, you're talking, thinking or reading about the conflict," he said at the launch of his new book The Promise of Israel, held Nov. 5 at Holy Blossom Temple.

"Eighty-five per cent of conversations about Israel are actually conversations about Israel's enemies. It's hardly ever a conversation about why the Jews need a state. And it seems to be that that's a dangerous conversation not to have. Because young people won't want to be part of that conversation."

The future of Israel requires the next generation to feel connected to the state that arose out of the ashes of the Holocaust and amid a sea of enemies, he told the crowd of about 300 people.

He says the connection must be positive and not based on fear.

"We're not going to be able to build Jewish identity or Zionist identity on the backs of what happened in 1948. We're not going to be able to build it on antisemitism or the fear of antisemitism," said Rabbi Gordis, senior vice-president of the Shalem Center, a research institute in Jerusalem.

"The Jewish state is going to have to earn our support and love because it actually stands for something," he said.

"I wrote the book to try and move the conversation away from our enemies, who are always going to be there, against whom we'll always have to be vigilant, but they're not what we're all about. We're about what we're trying to build."

One of the main arguments in his book is that the usual criticism of Israel – that a state founded on one specific religion, for one people, can never be truly democratic – is actually one of Israel's greatest strengths, and an example for the rest of the world to copy.

"[Israel] has provided its citizens infinitely greater liberty and prosperity than anyone expected, faring far better than any other young nation. Given Israel's success, it would make sense for many other countries, from Rwanda to Afghanistan and even Iran, to look at how they've done it," he writes in his book.

Rabbi Gordis said Israel faces a challenge with its young people.

"Israel has to raise a generation of kids who are willing to make enormous sacrifices to preserve the Jewish state, grow up in a state of war and dream for peace," he said. "It's a very hard thing to do: to be at war [with an enemy] and not hate the whole group."

This is the new discussion Jewish families need to be having about Israel, he argued.

"When [Rabbi Gordis] speaks, you listen to him. When he writes, you read him. Rabbi Gordis makes you think better, often differently from how you were viewing things previously. Most of all, his love of Israel is contagious. All of this came through [at the launch], as it does in The Promise of Israel," Holy Blossom's senior rabbi, John Moscovitz, told The CJN.

Israeli non-profit updates supporters

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Benji Maor was in Toronto last week to meet local supporters of Beit Issie Shapiro and to describe new developments for the Israel-based non-profit organization (NPO).

There was plenty to report. At the top of the list was its being granted "special consultative status" by the United Nations Economic and Social Council, said Maor. Beit Issie's director of international resource development.

That's the same UN agency that makes social and economic policy recommendations to the General Assembly and that recently added Sudan to its membership list.

Nevertheless, the consultative designation places Beit Issie among a select group of 12 Israeli organizations to merit that position and it allows Beit Issie to share its research, techniques and innovations in providing services for developmentally disabled youngsters and adults. The NPO also acts as their advocate to ensure they become fully integrated members of society.

In addition to its UN recognition, Beit Issie won the Midot award given to the non-profit organization judged the most effective, Maor said. Midot is an Israeli organization that monitors NPOs for effectiveness in improving people's lives and solving social problems.

Canadians can benefit from solutions developed by Beit Issie in Israel, Maor continued. The organization is conducting collaborative research with the University of Toronto to develop tools to improve the quality of life for children with disabilities, he noted.

"Israelis are known for thinking outside the box," Maor said, pointing to a multi-sensory environmental therapy that had been developed in Europe and used for recreational purposes for seniors.

Called Snoezelen in Holland, where it was first created, the Israeli application involves the setting up of a multi-sensory room that delivers stimuli using lighting, colour, sounds, music and odours. This can "dramatically impact the sense of well-being of people with developmental disabilities, relaxing them, focusing them, and arousing their curiosity and exploration," Beit Issie states on its website.

"We brought it to Israel and used it for people with [developmental] disabilities, like autism, and we expanded it," Maor said.

Beit Issie was also at the forefront of employing sports therapy to help its clients.

"We think about the whole life experience," Maor explained. "We don't just treat the disability, we look at the whole person. We increase their quality of life experience."

In that context, Beit Issie provides support groups for grandparents of kids with disabilities, to help them relate to their grandchildren and to relieve the stresses their children are going through, he added.

Beit Issie's good works are well known in Israel, but less so in the Diaspora, he said. "Part of my mission is to make people aware of the organization."

Trevor Stein, president of the Canadian Friends of Beit Issie Shapiro, pointed out that the organization's work benefits everyone, including many Israeli Arabs.

While in Toronto, Maor attended a breakfast gathering sponsored by Canadian Friends of Beit Issie Shapiro.

Titled "Mornings with Movers, punching beyond our weight," it featured two entrepreneurs discussing the successful businesses they created in the technology domain.

David Ossip, founder of Workbrain and Dayforce, said he left a restrictive and limiting corporate world to start his own businesses. A "serial entrepreneur," Ossip said he is constantly looking for opportunities and when he conceives of one, he does "a tremendous amount of research" to ensure it succeeds.

Ex-choir leader charged with sexual assault on boys

IsraAID reaching out to help New York residents on the road to recovery

Arrival of humanitarian organization comes at an opportune time

By Daniel Horowitz

To see parts of New York under water, senior citizens carefully navigating makeshift walkways constructed from cracked doors and pieces of driftwood as they clutch their worldly possessions in a garbage bag may sound like the plot of a summer blockbuster.

But, for the 4,000 residents of Breezy Point, N.Y. it's an all-too-real scenario.

Fortunately, members of IsraAID - with the support of its long-time partner and largest financial supporter, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, are working on the ground in the most impoverished and devastated areas of the United States, helping out the neediest Hurricane Sandy victims. Most of their tasks include delivering food, removing debris, and helping people restore their homes. However, one of the biggest issues that they are up against is that many of the Americans they are helping are very poor and lack the proper insurance to fix the damage. IsraAID is presently trying to find a solution to this problem.

Founded in 2001, IsraAID is a consortium of Israeli organizations that offers humanitarian aid in different areas, and which sent teams of specialists to New Orleans in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, the 2005 tsunami in Southeast Asia, the January, 2010 earthquake in Haiti, and the Two members of IsraAID console a woman in Breezy Point, New York, whose home was damaged by Hurricane Sandy. IsraAID workers are helping the town of 4,000 regain peace of mind following the devastation caused by Sandy.

2011 earthquake that devastated Japan, and many other natural disasters.

Although Hurricane Sandy reached landfall on October 29, for the residents of Breezy Point, N.Y. it might as well have been yesterday.

Canals of flood water pool around families homes with crumbling stairwells and walkways sunk amidst debris and rubble. Homes with their awnings knocked off, strewn dozens of feet away, are left even more susceptible to further impending damage from inclement weather.

Locating the most at risk and figuring out what they need, then how to get it to them were the first steps the IsraAID team took.

IsraAID's arrival came at an opportune time when manpower is in short supply as many of the volunteers were forced to give up their efforts and return to their jobs elsewhere.

The IsraAID team, led by Voni Glick, joined full force with local organizations in efforts to deal with the damage caused by the 6 to 8 feet surge that smashed through this little peninsula, and has yet to completely recede.

With incredible support by the local Jewish community of Merrick, the team is now urgently recruiting as many additional work teams as possible from Israel and the Jewish world to participate in addressing the overwhelming needs of Breezy Point as quickly and efficiently as possible.

Plans are also being made to help those in neighbouring Far Rockaway, an impoverished area where looting has been widespread, leading shops to place signs in their windows, on which spray paint messages read "already been looted, nothing left to take."

"You'd expect in a place like New York that these victims would be saturated with help. But what we are doing is moving people to tears," said IsraAID volunteer, Nathan Lyons.

"We're proud to partner with IsraAID as they provide a shining example of Israeli know-how, courage and compassion to help the people in the Northeast United States - whose lives were turned upside down by Hurricane Sandy - regain some peace of mind," said Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "Our long-standing relationship with IsraAID has allowed Toronto's Jewish community to play a hands-on role whenever tragedy strikes around the world."

By Daniel Horowitz

In a world where too often we take our good fortune for granted, and our youngsters often display a sense of entitlement, it's refreshing to see an example of somebody giving back.

It's particularly heartening when that commitment to tzedakah is the brainchild of just that, a child.

That is exactly the case of Orly Malka, who, upon turning ten, decided that, instead of the guests at her recent birthday party bringing her gifts, the opportunity would be better served helping other, less fortunate children.

Prior to Orly's October 14th party at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre at York Region's Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, Orly, an intelligent and self-assured youngster, asked her guests that, in lieu of presents, they make a donation to the Orly Malka Tzedakah Fund that she set up with the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

From the earnings of that fund Orly has the opportunity to make gifts of her own choosing to various needy tikkun olam projects.

And, with 43 party goers helping Orly celebrate her move into the two-digit age, there's little doubt that the impact of her decision will go a long way.

"I learned from my school, Associated Kamin, and from my Mom, all about how important it is to be involved in our community, to volunteer, and to give back," said Orly, flashing her dynamite grin. "I volunteer at UJA whenever I can, and this summer, on our family trip, Mom and I volunteered at an Ethiopian Absorption Centre that UJA supports, and I met with children, many of whom had just moved to Israel. For my tenth birthday, all I wanted was to celebrate in a fun way with my family and friends and have them be part of giving tzedakah."

And, considering the example set by her mother, there's little doubt that a predisposition to tzedakah, and community, was inevitable as far as Orly was concerned.

Her mother, Aviva, is a veteran professional with UJA Federation, and is currently the organization's Vice-President, Missions Operations & Corporate Fund Development.

"I am in awe that ten years have come and gone," says the understandably proud mother. "Watching Orly embrace and understand the principles and concept of these important Jewish values makes me so proud of her. It's always been my privilege to work on behalf of our community and, now, knowing that Orly is starting to understand 'why', means so much to me. Her decision to have her tenth birthday benefit others, rather than herself, is a testament to that understanding. She's a remarkable girl."

Orly's birthday party, held on the same day as the Grand Opening of the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, an initiative of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, saw the 44 youngsters enjoy arts and crafts before moving the shindig to the dance studio where they showed off their hip hop moves.

"My Mom told me about the Jewish Foundation and about how our Jewish community is growing and about some of the help that people in Jewish Toronto really need," explained Orly. "The people at UJA and the Foundation really helped me learn about how to start my fund. It was so easy. I highly recommend that other kids do it, too. I even had a private meeting at UJA without my mom, when, for my eighth birthday, I started the fund. If more kids had birthday parties like mine, just think about how many more people the Jewish Foundation could help."

How does that saying go? "From the mouths of babes..."

Reform is 'another option' for Israelis, leader says

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Although the Reform movement in Israel has grown in recent years to 37 congregations, 55 preschools, five elementary schools and two high schools, its biggest issue remains creating more awareness among Israelis.

Yaron Shavit, chair of the Israeli Movement for Progressive Judaism (IMPJ), would like more Israelis to recognize that "there is another option to connect with their Jewish heritage, rather than the Orthodox option which they choose not to connect to. Our biggest potential is within the chilonim [secular Israelis] like myself."

As well, he added, there are "numerous" members of the Israeli Reform, or Progressive, community, who used to be Orthodox or even haredi. They were disappointed with Orthodoxy, but still want to be connected to Judaism "in a liberal, egalitarian way," he said.

The 54-year-old Tel Aviv lawyer – whose Israeli-accented, British-tinged English reflects his Sabra roots and the school he attended for two years as a boy in Malawi – was in Toronto last week for ARZA Canada Week to speak at Temple Emanu-El and Temple Kol Ami. ARZA Canada is the Canadian arm of Reform Zionism.

Shavit first entered a Reform congregation on a visit to the United States at age 17 and became involved in the movement in Israel after his eldest child chose to celebrate his bar mitzvah 14 years ago at the Reform congregation in Mevaseret Zion, a community near Jerusalem where the Shavit family had just moved.

Yaron Shavit

Now in the first year of his second two-year term as chair of IMPJ, Shavit said the most common misconception about the movement in Israel is that it is less respectful of tradition – "that it's some kind of demonstration or statement, rather than a way of life."

He added that he works with other denominations "very strongly and very respectfully" as a member of the executive of the World Zionist Organization.

"The things that bring us together are much bigger than those that divide us."

Shavit works with Masorti (Conservative) counterparts to fight the Orthodox "monopoly on Jewish life" that includes marriage, conversion and kashruth.

Both in the courtroom and through the media, "more and more Israelis speak out and say they've had enough of the unilateralization," Shavit said.

He spoke positively of the legal struggles, saying they've been "very successful." The most recent case in point was the Supreme Court judgment about Rabbi Miri Gold, the first non-Orthodox rabbi to receive a salary from the Israeli government.

Shavit's own rabbi is paid by the congregation and the Reform movement, even though his congregation is the largest in Mevaseret Zion, with 210 families, he said. The community also has seven Orthodox rabbis, all of whom are paid by the government, he added. The Reform movement would "prefer a separation between governmental funds and religious services," Shavit said, but he believes there would be positive changes if Rabbi David Stav, chair of Tzohar, the organization of moderate Orthodox rabbis in Israel, were to become Israel's chief Ashkenazi rabbi next March.

He shares Rabbi Stav's concerns about Jewish identity, he added. "We're very much concerned about being able to reach a common agreed denominator regarding the Jewishness of everyone else."

Shavit remains optimistic about the future.

"History teaches us that Jewish peoplehood has managed to survive for so many thousands of years, because within it there were always forces fighting for two different things."

Without strong roots, Judaism would perish, he said. And without "updating ourselves," he believes the same thing would happen.

"The dynamics between these two things makes me very optimistic. We'll find a way to do it together."

Mashgiach received a visit at work

"The one mashgiach... owed a significant amount [$3,000] was Michael Klein."

The Kashruth Council provided The C/N with a letter from Klein saying that he was "aware of the advantage of the overtime policy" and that he's proud to work for COR. The letter concludes, "I am hoping... 'Shalom,' i.e. peace, will prevail in this matter."

Klein, a current Kashruth Council mashgiach, did not reply to a request from The C/N to clarify the circumstances or reasons for writing the letter and returning the funds.

One mashgiach, who spoke to The C/N but asked not to be identified, said he was cautioned by a friend not to sign the document: "Who knows what you're signing?"

He said Kashruth Council staff then paid him a visit at work. "They surrounded me, they pulled out my [unsigned waiver] and others' signed forms. 'They're showing me this one, this one. You know him? Why don't you sign?' They left, saying, 'I hope you'll do the right thing' [but later, called] me back: 'We're still waiting.'"

The intensity of those demands seemed disproportionate to him. "Something must... be up if they really want my signature. That's the scary part... They're saying I'm the only one that didn't sign. They're really desperate... and it beats me. I don't have any idea why."

But Rabkin said no mashgiach was coerced. "COR... would never engage in any reprisal against an employee who chose not to withdraw or assert their rights."

A statement of support for agency, which was posted on its website and signed by more than 40 mashgichim, reads, "COR pays us overtime pay. COR pays us public holiday pay, vacation pay and all other compensation... we are disturbed by the efforts of a few individuals to distort COR's pay policy."

Most of the signatures weren't from the 58 mashgichim named in the ministry order.

Suggesting that the online story was maliciously leaked by Rand because he holds a grudge against the Kashruth Council, Rabkin asked, "Why is one person... whipping up so much negativity towards a non-profit [community] institution?"

Speaking to The C/N, Rand replied: "It's simple: follow the law. Why are they any different than anybody else? If they change and become the agency they should be... honest, treating employees with respect and paying them properly, I've... won. That's my vendetta."

An OLRB spokesperson said the board can't comment on specific cases, which are confidential, but added it does advocate trying to reach a settlement in such instances.

Israeli view missing from some Gaza reports

It didn't last for long, at least not in some areas of the media: that is, sympathetic attention to the Israeli perspective on the Gaza operation during the first day (Nov. 14) started to give way by that evening as this column was being written) to the familiar narrative of Israel as recklessly belligerent.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

During his noon report for CBC News Network and in subsequent reports that afternoon following Israel's targeted killing of Ahmed Jabari, the head of Hamas' military operations, Sasha Petricic included substantial Israeli context. He said that Israel had killed the "mastermind" behind numerous attacks on Israelis and cited the Israeli military claim that Jabari "had blood on his hands." He explained that Israel had been "showered" by rocket fire from Gaza over several days and that Israel had promised some form of retaliation in order to reassert its deterrence against further attacks. He also noted that Israeli missiles were targeting "sites [in Gaza] used for rocket firing."

However, just hours later, during his report for the National, much of the Israeli context, including any reference to Israel's efforts to destroy rocket launchers and storage sites, was missing. What remained amidst scenes of wreckage in Gaza, including a gratuitous shot of what was claimed to be Jabari's remains, was the sense of a "tit-for-tat" targeting of civilians. One could be left believing that Israel and Hamas were both simply going after civilians.

By contrast, Martin Seemungal's story for CTV National News retained considerable Israeli perspective. He included comment from IDF spokesperson Lt.-Col. Avital Liebovich explaining the reason for Israel's operation and comment from Israeli Prime Minister Netanyahu about the need to protect Israelis by ending attacks from Gaza. While also showing what had happened in Gaza, Seemungal ended his report on this encouraging note: "Israel said that it doesn't want war – only an end to rocket fire."

However, the turn to a negative focus on Israel was signalled by this headline in a story by the Globe and Mail's Paul Koring and Patrick Martin (online, also on the evening of Nov. 14): "Slaying of Hamas commander threatens fragile Middle East peace." While Koring and Martin included a quote from Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak that Israel doesn't want war but will no longer put up with continuing rocket fire from Gaza, they nonetheless, predictably, put the onus on Israel rather than Hamas (and the Muslim Brotherhood that supports them) for adding to regional instability. One can hardly speak of "fragile peace" while the carnage goes on unabated in Syria. This is a case of getting things precisely backwards.

Arguing that Hamas overplayed its hand, the Jerusalem Post's Yaakov Lappin provided the missing perspective: "With Hamas feeling confident over the ascendancy of its fellow Islamists in the region, and the emergence of a new patron in Cairo, it and Islamic Jihad chipped away at Israeli deterrence, attempting to set new rules by preventing the IDF from carrying out vital security missions on the Gaza border. As it built up its rocket arsenals, Hamas and the other factions responded to Israel's measures to secure the border with more and more indiscriminate rocket barrages on the long-suffering south, filling the lives of hundreds of thousands of civilians with dread, trauma and disruption."

ing the lives of hundreds of thousands of civilians with dread, trauma and disruption."

tion."

What other country would be expected, as Israel is, to forebear under such relentless assaults on its sovereign territory? Israel's situation is unique in the world: it's the only country that's expected to live with a substantial portion of its population – more than one million people – under this constant threat. The pummelling of Israel's south has gone on for so long that it seems almost routine, and most of the world has grown indifferent to it.

Surely Jonathan Kay asked the critical question (in his National Post column): "Why should Israel not be expected to fight back when Hamas, Islamic Jihad and other terrorist groups seek to murder Israel in this fashion?"

Why not indeed?

A Great SCHOOL

A bar/bat mitzvah revolution

Rabbi Noam Katz

I recently attended one of the most memorable bar or bat mitzvahs I have ever been to. It wasn't the purity of the trope chanted nor the list of "thank yous" that made it stand out. Rather, it was how well the sacred ceremony aligned with what came after.

Amid the bagel spread and the DJ hired to spin Top 40 hits lay a pile of unopened boxes from Ikea on the floor of the shul lobby. They contained unassembled bookshelves, which the bar mitzvah boy and his friends put together over the next two hours. Once completed, they lined the lobby walls, and temple congregants were asked to fill them with books. Eventually, these fully stocked shelves were donated to a nearby school in a low-income neighbourhood.

This confluence of action and empathy crystallized the meaning behind the life-cycle event we were celebrating that day. The bar mitzvah boy had proclaimed to the world his Jewish and universal priorities, and modelled for his classmates meaningful ways they might turn their own simchahs into acts of social justice.

Compare this to the lavish opulence that characterizes so many bar and bat mitzvah celebrations. For decades, these parties have dwarfed the true meaning of becoming a bar or bat mitzvah – that is, a young person taking on increased obligations so as to strengthen, and become strengthened, by his or her community. What was once a spiritual and educational milestone has materialized into something... well, material. More alarming is that a growing percentage of students treat this rite of passage as a chance to "cash out their chips" in Jewish education and opt out of synagogue life altogether. Rabbi Rick Jacobs, president of the Union for Reform Judaism, has said, "The dropout rates post-b'nai can gather, socialize, learn and develop skills. Camps, day schools, and peer trips to Israel are proven leaders in this field, offering an immersive environment for teens to mark Jewish time with their peers in settings that blend formal and informal learning.

Some synagogues have bar and bat mitzvah students develop "spiritual portfolios" or demonstrate Jewish growth through the arts. Others sponsor wilderness hikes that call students to Torah in the great outdoors. Whichever paths we try, we must be bold and creative, and we must bring teens into this laboratory of creativity.

Their continued engagement in Jewish life will be on their terms, not those of their parents or Jewish professionals. Like heavily visited websites, the most successful programs will feature "user-generated content."

So it was at that memorable bar mitzvah event, in which sacred scrolls accompanied just-as-sacred hammers and nails. It transformed my understanding of what bar and bat mitzvahs can be, and allowed me to witness a young person become a "son of the mitzvah," in precisely the way he had envisioned. How revolutionary.

Rabbi Noam Katz is dean of Jewish Living at Toronto's Leo Baeck Day School and URJ Camp George.

Rabbinic Reflections

mitzvah in the vast majority of congregations are staggering... We cannot afford – on any level – to allow our teens to leave our Jewish institutions just as they are entering critical identity-making years."

Therein lies the rub. As our students become more sophisticated in thought and are afforded experiences that will shape their adult lives, they're leaving institutions of Jewish learning in droves. Some teens I've spoken with consider post-bar and bat mitzvah Jewish education to be uninspiring, irrelevant, a waste of time.

How to respond? Jewish institutions must re-position themselves as compelling centres where young adults

I have a dream

Most of us are aware that the Hebrew month of Kislev is significant, since the holiday of Chanukah falls in Kislev.

But there's another significance to Kislev that's connected to the Torah portions we read this month. Most of the dream narratives within the Torah are read within the month of Kislev. In fact, Kislev is the ninth month of the Jewish year, and nine dream narratives are read during the month, so it's not surprising that Kislev is known as the month of dreams.

The dream sequences we read have to do with Joseph and his life transitions. In the beginning, Joseph is the dreamer who shares two of his dreams with his brothers and his father. The first dream involves himself and his brothers in the field working together binding sheaves. His brothers sheaves surround his and all bow down. When Joseph tells his brothers of this dream, we're told that his brothers hate him intensely.

The second dream has 11 stars, the sun and the moon all bowing down to Joseph. This time, Joseph tells not only his brothers, but also his father. His father angrily admonishes Joseph and asks whether he expects his father and mother to bow down to him.

The midrash and commentaries raise the question of Jacob's interpretation since Joseph's mother, Rachel, has already died and, therefore, could not bow down to him. This opens the door to questioning whether Joseph's dreams were not interpreted correctly. In the ancient world, bowing is not just a sign of respect, but also of welcoming. Perhaps Joseph's dreams were his expression of wanting to work with his brothers together in the field and have them welcome him. In other words, does the message of the dream lie within the dream itself or within the interpretation?

Joseph quickly understands that the power lies within the interpretation, and he recreates himself as a dream interpreter while in an Egyptian prison. It's this role of interpreter that will ultimately unlock doors of opportunity for Joseph.

In the Talmud and midrash, much attention is paid to dreams and the role they play in our lives. One part of the Talmud tells us that a dream left uninterpreted is like a letter left unopened. And yet, we're to take great care with whom we share our dreams, for they may interpret them, and the interpretation gives them power.

According to the sages, if you're worried about the meaning of your dream, you should gather three people together and, in their presence, give the dream a positive interpretation. You should say to your friends, "I saw a good dream" and they should respond with affirming that it's indeed good and that God should turn everything within it toward the good and positive.

Interpreting our dreams toward the positive is a wonderful way to teach ourselves that we're the masters of our perspectives in everything we do. During the month of Kislev we can spend a moment talking to our friends, interpreting and praying that all our dreams come true.

Father donates kidney to daughter

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Ruchoma "Leeba" Adler can thank her father, Zecharia, for giving her a new lease on life.

The three-year-old little girl, who was born with bilateral renal dysplasia, mild lung hypoplasia and global developmental delay, is scheduled to receive a kidney from her father on Nov. 22 at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Doctors call the surgery a lifesaving measure.

Ever since she was born, Leeba, with the support of her parents Zecharia and Dena, both 27, has undergone weekly blood labs and frequent hospital admissions, and has been on a rigorous medication schedule.

She has also required therapists to help her with vital basic skills such as eating, walking – she recently took her first steps – talking, progressing cognitively and developing socially.

Dena said the surgery will help Leeba immensely. "She has a funky personality and likes to be challenged, and this will give her the opportunity for optimal health."

Leeba will be hospitalized for close to a month after the surgery and will then require daily hospital visits, Dena said.

Zecharia was about to enter law school when Leeba was born, but he and his wife put their life on hold to care for Leeba and their two other children, Shifra, 5, and Binyamin, 4.

"Our life has been on hold, but it has become our normal," Dena said.

Community objects to Mount Royal's demise

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The organized Jewish community expressed its opposition to the proposed elimination of Mount Royal riding at public hearings on the redrawing of the federal electoral map, saying it would divide the Jewish community and separate it from its institutions.

The federal government's plan is to replace much of Mount Royal's territory with a new riding called John Peters Humphrey, which would stretch from Victoria Avenue in Snowdon westward to encompass Dorval, and divide Côte St. Luc in two.

In a brief presented to the Federal Electoral Boundaries Commission on Nov. 12, leaders of Federation CJA and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), as well as the federation's social services agency Ometz, said the change will have "a direct and significant impact on the Jewish community."

They say the Jewish community, which represents about 36 per cent of Mount Royal's 101,000 residents, represents "a community of interest or identity," one of the defining characteristics of a federal riding according to the law.

They noted that Jews have lived in significant numbers in Mount Royal for much of its history, since its creation in 1924.

The riding is currently represented by Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler. He's held the district since 1999. Before that, it was held by longtime Liberal MP Sheila Finestone, and before that by former prime minister Pierre Trudeau, also a Liberal.

"We believe that our communal interests are most effectively represented by a single MP and that by separating parts of our community from several of its key social service and communal institutions, the proposed change in boundaries will serve to weaken our overall political representation," the brief states.

It's signed by federation CEO Deborah Corber, CIJA Quebec vice-president Luciano Del Negro and Ometz co-executive director Howard Berger.

They say that moving the eastern boundary of the riding from Côte des Neiges Road, where Mount Royal now extends, to Victoria would result in a "disconnect" between the majority of Jewish community members and such institutions as the Jewish General Hospital (JGH), Jewish Eldercare Centre, Project Genesis, Mada Community Centre and several synagogues.

This could mean dealing with more than one MP whenever federal issues arose, they say.

"The result of the proposed boundary changes would be to impose an artificial political boundary between the efforts of one MP to advocate on behalf of the Jewish community writ large and another MP to represent select Jewish community institutions."

The new John Peters Humphrey riding would not take in the area where Mount Royal's constituency office is located on Kent Avenue, they note.

The office has been at that address since 1984 and is a good one, the organizations say, because of its centrality and easy accessibility.

They also note that the proposed new riding would have a population of 104,628, which is above the recommended limit of 101,321 set for Quebec by the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. Mount Royal's population is almost on target at 101,273.

The YM-YVHA, JGH, the Jewish Russian Community Centre, and Congregation Shomrim Laboker also made presentations to the commission last week.

In its brief, the Y said that 74 per cent of the nearly 8,000 members of its main Snowdon branch live in Mount Royal riding, and that the branch has been located in the riding since the 1950s.

"So it cannot and should not be a surprise that the YM-YVHA is dismayed and acutely concerned by the Federal Electoral Boundaries Commission's proposal to do away with the Mount Royal riding and split it into three new federal districts, i.e., John Peters Humphrey, Outremont and Wilder Penfield," states the brief, signed by president Peter Lewis and executive director Marlene Jennings.

The Y recommends that any reconfiguring of the electoral map ensure that the Jewish communities in Côte St. Luc, Hampstead, Town of Mount Royal and Côte des Neiges/Snowdon continue to be located within one riding.

(The towns of Mount Royal and Hampstead would remain intact in the proposed John Peters Humphrey riding.)

Canada's electoral map is revised every 10 years, after the census is conducted, to reflect population growth and shifts. Quebec is to receive three additional seats, for a total of 78.

The late John Peters Humphrey, a Montrealer and McGill University professor, was the first director of the United Nations human rights division and the principal drafter of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Ayelet memorialized

MONTREAL — A sefer Torah in memory of Ayelet Yakira Galena, the two-year-old granddaughter of Rabbi Reuben Poupko, will be dedicated at Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron on Dec. 8, the first night of Chanukah.

Ayelet, the daughter of Rabbi Poupko's daughter Hindy and her husband Seth Galena of New York City, died last January of a rare bone marrow disease.

Some 14,000 people around the world daily followed the toddler's struggle for life and her family's roller-coaster of emotions online at her parents' Eye on Ayelet blog.

The young couple asked for – and received – prayers from thousands of mostly strangers who came to be known as "Ayelet nation." The search for a bone marrow donor went nationwide, and the transplant took place 154 days before the toddler died.

On Nov. 12, Hindy Poupko Galena was named to the Forward 50, a list of the 50 American Jews that the Jewish Daily Forward judges to have had the greatest impact as leaders in various fields over the past year.

Poupko Galena, 29, grew up in Montreal, leaving to attend Yeshiva University's Stern College. She works at the Jewish Community Relations Council in New York, heading Israeli and international affairs. Seth Galena, an Internet entrepreneur, is founder of the "kosher comedy" website Bang It Out.

Rabbi Poupko said the Torah was commissioned by his congregation to honour both Ayelet and the courage of her parents.

"This is a wonderful initiative by those who were touched by Ayelet's story and wanted to do something meaningful," he said.

The Torah is a small portable one, suitable for taking to shivah houses or hospitals, for example.

Berbrayer to become head of JNF Man./Sask.

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Music producer Karla Berbrayer is the incoming president of the Jewish National Fund, Manitoba/Saskatchewan region.

Since Rob Berkowits became the group's executive director about a year ago, "he has been bringing more younger people into our board," Berbrayer said.

"While we respect the advice and guidance of our senior members, we need to have younger people on board. I am a link between the younger and older members of the board."

Berbrayer is replacing Mel Lazareck, who has been Jewish National Fund (JNF) president here for the past six years. "I am honoured to be following in the footsteps of Mel Lazareck," Berbrayer said.

"And I am looking forward to working with the strong staff in the JNF office and building on the success of what has been done over the past few years in Winnipeg."

Lazareck, who is Manitoba's special representative to Israel, advising on economic and community projects in Israel, had wanted to step down earlier, but there was no one to replace him.

Now, with Berbrayer as president, Lazareck said he plans to remain on the JNF board and continue to work to strengthen the bond between Manitoba, Canada and Israel.

Berkowits has created a transition mechanism for the JNF board, as well as a handbook outlining the duties and responsibilities of board members. Thus, Berbrayer will serve a two-year term and will be succeeded by Jessica Cogan, her vice-president — a new board position.

Berbrayer is best known in Winnipeg's Jewish community as one of the founding producers of the popular Rady Jewish Community Centre's Music 'N' Mavens series, now in its 14th season, and the Rady JCC's Israeli Concert Series, in its 10th season. For the past three years, she has also been the producer of Rady JCC's Tarbut: Festival of Jewish Culture. As an independent producer and source of largely Israeli musical talent, she has developed an international reputation and worked with a variety of other non-profit and arts and entertainment groups.

In addition to serving on several boards and committees, including Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, Shalom Residences and Herzlia Synagogue, Berbrayer was vice-president of the board of Community Respite Services of Manitoba and is a volunteer with Manitoba Riding for the Disabled.

She also books musical performers for the JNF's annual Negev Gala, she has been a JNF board member since 2009, and produced and co-chaired the 2012 Negev Gala, which honoured philanthropists Bonnie and John Buhler.

"There have been a number of positive changes at the JNF here since I became a board member," Berbrayer says. "There are a lot of new ideas happening, and we are going in new directions."

"We do more than plant trees. We have to continue to make people more aware of the JNF's other projects and initiatives."

Cogan, who is originally from Edmonton, has served on JNF's Manitoba/Saskatchewan region board since 2009. In 2012, she co-chaired, with Berbrayer, the Negev Gala.

A lawyer, Cogan participated in the March of the Living; she has been a member of the executive of Hillel — Jewish Student's Association at the University of Alberta and a member of the boards of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton, Aleph-Bet (a Winnipeg Jewish daycare) and the Winnipeg Beach Day Camp.

In 2009, Cogan participated in the JNF's Ambassador Program. She was one of 12 people from across Canada who toured Israel and were tasked with the mission of educating their specific communities about the projects that JNF support in Israel.

GREENHOUSE GROWING

Students at Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill are growing an array of plants including vegetables and herbs growing in two large indoor greenhouses. The students planted seeds and are learning how to regulate the temperature. They hope hoping to transplant the plants outside in the spring. Want a good separation agreement? Make sure you both have a good lawyer.

Family Matters

John Syrtash

B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Counsel

Garfin Zeidenberg LLP Family Lawyer & Mediator for 31 years

Question: My husband and I have decided to get a divorce. I'm planning to hire a family law lawyer, but he refuses to. If I'm represented and he isn't, is that an advantage or disadvantage for me?

Answer: Sometimes people hire me and celebrate when their spouse has no lawyer, thinking that their spouse will be "putty in your hands." If we negotiate or are forced to go to court, such a client might think that I will shoot like Sidney Crosby facing an empty net.

What such a "maven" doesn't realize is that a spouse without legal advice will often cost a client more than if his/her partner is properly represented.

Let us imagine that my client, Ms. Narishfreu, instructs me not to insist that her husband obtain his own independent lawyer to negotiate their separation agreement. Mr. N. then signs whatever I put in front of him. The agreement calls for a split of assets in my client Mrs. N.'s favour, a generous amount payable for child and spousal support, sole custody of the children to Mrs. N. (with minimal access rights to the father), and an uncontested divorce. The naive and unsuspecting Mr. N. even signs a clause saying that I gave him the option to seek independent legal advice, but he opted not to do so.

One year after having signed his rights away, Mr. N can't or won't pay under the deal, so he goes to a lawyer who tells him, "Mr. N, you obviously didn't know what you were signing. You didn't have independent legal advice. Welcome aboard."

This lawyer then asks the Court to set aside the whole agreement because Mr. N. was not properly represented when he signed it.

Ms. Narishfreu, who one year ago thought she had Mr. N right where she wanted him, is now paying me twice: once to draft an agreement for her husband to sign, and a second time to litigate whether or not that agreement is "enforceable", meaning whether or not it should be set aside by the Court.

Now imagine if there is was no such agreement to begin with. I would then be litigating against someone in Court who is not represented to resolve the dispute. Then it would again often cost more time and money than if my opposition was represented by counsel.

First of all, if the client does not know what he is doing in court, it's like Mario Andretti attempting to race the Indy 500 flanked by a driver who does not even possess a driver's license. He/she will not know the basics of legal court procedures, such as when or how to file legal documents and in what order, the rules of evidence, not to interrupt when someone else is speaking, etc. There will be frequent motions to adjourn, or stall and delay the proceedings, because the Courts bend over backwards to unrepresented counsel so as to appear fair.

The unrepresented party will talk ad nauseum about details — like the minutiae of their marriage — that in most cases are of no interest to the Court, or deliver 50 page affidavits that no one will read, but slip in one or two facts that must be refuted.

Most importantly, attempting to negotiate with such individuals is like asking Mount Everest to move over a few inches. They often don't know the law or what is likely to happen if they refuse to compromise, and are too emotionally attached to their positions.

In short, Ms. Narishfreu's bill will be much bigger than if her ex had been properly represented in the first place.

Everyone is entitled to represent themselves, and I am not in favour of taking away that right, especially since so many people cannot afford to pay a lawyer at any cost. Nor does every self-represented individual fit the foregoing description. However, I usually implore my client's spouse to obtain competent family law counsel so that it will save both parties significant time and money — and result in an agreement that is both lasting and binding.

Unicorn Gala aids grieving children

Susan Minuk
Special to The C.J.N.

Guests at the recent Unicorn Gala had the chance to purchase a seat for a child on a bus to an overnight camp that supports grieving children and teens.

Some 400 guests attended the Nov. 6 gala at the Arcadian Court in Toronto in support of the Max and Beatrice Wolfe Children's Centre (MBWCC), which operates Camp Erin Toronto.

Established in 2004, the MBWCC, at the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care at Mount Sinai Hospital, provides home palliative care support to dying children and their families and counselling and bereavement programs for children and youth living with the dying or death of a loved one.

The Unicorn Gala returned this year after several years' hiatus. Gala co-chairs Jill Phillip and Rebecca Diamond said that 81 bus seats were purchased, which raised a total of more than $40,000.

Josh Dusang, 11, and Rachel Dusang, 9, who lost their father in a car accident on Nov. 17, 2011, spoke at the gala. "We are stronger kids now and have a better way of coping with our loss since going to grief counselling, participating in monthly programs at the centre and experiencing Camp Erin — all offered through the MBWCC."

Traditional outdoor camp activities are combined with grief education and emotional support activities at Camp Erin, which is free to all families.

Several people were honoured during the evening, including MBWCC founder Dr. Larry Librach; Abby Tobias, president of Sole Power Productions and Dr. Aubrey Green, who specializes in sports medicine.

Musicians Marla Joy and Kibwe Thomas provided entertainment at the gala, and guests participated in a silent auction. Guest Albert Milstein won a diamond valued at $6,200, in a raffle sponsored by Mark Lash. Milstein later donated the diamond to the MBWCC.

The Unicorn Gala "began with a five-year-old little girl named Samantha, who was dying of a brain tumour," Librach said. "Her mother was determined to see community supports for dying children." The gala was named for Samantha's favourite animal, the unicorn.

Dr. Adam Rapoport, a pediatric palliative care consultant for MBWCC, said that the MBWCC consists of two clinical elements: the Dr. Jay Children's Grief Program and in-home pediatric palliative care. "Although most of us think about death and dying when we think about palliative care, the truth is that pediatric palliative care is much more focused on living; our motto is 'adding life to a child's time, not just time to a child's life,'" he said.

Andrea Warnick, a grief counsellor and registered nurse at the MBWCC, said a huge part of the centre's work "is to make sure that children do not feel responsible in any way for the death in their family. We know that if you can get in there before a death happens and influence whether the child knows that mommy is dying but the child is not responsible, you can go very far toward influencing their bereavement process."

Warnick added that the MBWCC's goal is "not to fix a child's broken heart but to teach a child how to live with a broken heart. I often hear, 'That must be so hard,' but the truth is that doing my job is not the hard part. The hard part is not being able to do this job for everyone who needs it."

Project puts kids' libraries in abuse shelters

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Act to End Violence Against Women has started a new project that will help women and children living in shelters turn a new page.

The organization is planning to furnish and stock children's libraries in shelters across Canada.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of Act to End Violence Against Women, said the group embarked on the project, Turning the Page, because it wanted to create a peaceful oasis for women and their children who live in shelters.

Each library, finished in colourful and comfortable furnishings, will be equipped with a wide variety of new books suitable for children of all ages, as well as games, puzzles, and a computer with age-appropriate software.

When the children leave the shelter, Krowitz said, they're welcome to take a favourite book with them to their new home.

"These kids have had a lot of upheaval in their lives, and sometimes they're left with nothing. Getting a new book is important, because it is the beginning of a new life," she said. "Research shows that children who are abused or live with abuse are often educationally delayed. This also gives them the opportunity to increase their literacy."

The first library was opened in Montreal, said Krowitz, at Auberge Transition, a shelter for women and children who have been victims of violence. The next library, in Toronto, is set to open at Women's Habitat of Etobicoke.

In a letter of appreciation, Auberge Transition executive director Irene Jansson said that the library "is without a doubt one of the best gifts given to the children and their mothers. This space allows them to be the children they are."

"I have seen first hand the difference this library has made in the lives of the children, and I know that other shelters will also see the benefits associated with this project."

Krowitz said that one of the mothers at Auberge Transition said that she was touched that someone cared enough to provide something extra for them. "It made her feel worthwhile."

She said that Act to End Violence Against Women has partnered with organizations and private donors to fund the project — each library costs about $12,000 — including the Canadian Children's Book Centre, a national, not-for-profit organization, dedicated to encouraging, promoting and supporting the reading, writing, illustrating and publishing of Canadian books for young readers.

Krowitz said the group has also partnered with Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's youth and chesed committees.

"We are willing to partner with any group across the country that is interested, and donations of new books are welcome. We stress that the books need to be new, because we want the children to feel worthwhile and special."

Act to End Violence Against Women is holding a fundraiser, Turning the Page, Transforming Lives, on Nov. 26 at 7 p.m. at the Columbus Centre, featuring Toronto Star reporter Barbara Turnbull, who was shot and severely disabled during a robbery in 1983, when she was 18 years old.

Krowitz said they invited Turnbull, a "journalist, survivor and self-described trouble maker" to speak because she is "a survivor who turned her tragedy into a wonderful life."

Western students remember the Holocaust

Jessica Pollock

Imagine a world where there are no longer any living Holocaust survivors. A world where antisemitism is at risk of proliferating to degrees that we cannot yet fathom. A world where Holocaust deniers have greater opportunities to falsify facts and demean one of the most tragic events in Jewish history.

Guest Voice

Imagine we can no longer rely on the eyewitnesses to the very atrocities that occurred more than 60 years ago to tell and retell their personal narratives of heartache, perseverance and tenacity. We as second, third and fourth generations must take ownership of the past in order to sustain survivors' legacies for the future.

From Nov. 5 to 9, students at the University of Western Ontario in London, Ont., carried out that very responsibility during Western Hillel's annual Holocaust Education Week (HEW). What distinguished this year's HEW from others was the adoption of a fresh strategy to improve outreach to non-Jewish students. In addition to an innovative workshop on Holocaust denial and a special event featuring Holocaust survivor Pepa Livingstone recounting her experiences to students, the balance of HEW events involved partnerships with an assortment of student clubs.

This year, HEW organizers and committee members – Shira Gelkopf, Samantha Hershenfeld, Ariel Yehekel and myself – all agreed that cultivating partnerships for the weeklong programs was essential, since the Holocaust is not only a Jewish tragedy, but also a profound calamity for all of humankind.

For example, we held an exclusive film screening of Paragraph 175, a documentary film that chronicles the lives of homosexuals under Nazi rule. Due to the nature of the event, we approached the Western Undergraduate Film Society (WUFS) and PrideWestern, a club for LGBTQ students and their allies, inquiring if they would be interested in partnering with us for the screening. Both clubs were eager to contribute to HEW.

The executive members of WUFS in particular expressed their respect for our executive team on numerous occasions, commending our passion and dedication to Holocaust education.

Those who attended the screening, both Jewish and non-Jewish, were exposed to a hidden face of the Holocaust that few people are aware of or informed about.

Throughout the week, we organized a display in our university community centre that encouraged students to sign pledge cards with the objective of preventing social injustice. For this exhibit, we reached out to STAND Western, a club devoted to raising awareness about past genocides and Darfur in particular, and the Association for Baha'i Studies. Identifying the Holocaust as more than a mere "Jewish genocide" is crucial in connecting non-Jewish students to this tragedy. We knew that partnering with both of these clubs, which are involved in social justice issues, would help in this regard, and we were pleased when both quickly agreed to collaborate.

By the end of the week, our three clubs had worked together to acquire 250 signatures of Western students pledging to prevent social injustice – an unprecedented response to a HEW initiative. The students who participated also received a handout with pieces of testimony of a survivor or victim of the Holocaust, educating them about the genocide through the compelling vehicle of personal narratives. We collected testimonies from the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum's online resources and families of Western students, which humanized the Holocaust for other students.

Our outreach tactics with respect to the exhibit garnered a diverse group of student viewers, all of whom gathered under the shared goal of paying tribute to the past.

After this year's HEW, I am prouder than ever to identify with a dynamic community of organized student leaders on campus. Through innovative and successful outreach strategies such as the ones implemented this year, I feel confident that our generation is capable of and willing to preserve the legacy of the Holocaust now and in the future.

In Memoriam

LISA-ANN LAUREN POSLUNS ז"ל

In Loving Memory of

Our Darling Daughter, Sister, Aunt, Niece, Cousin, Friend, Colleague

March 30, 1964 – November 2, 2002 / 28 Mar Cheshvan 5763

REMEMBERING TEN YEARS LATER... WE WILL NEVER FORGET

Our devoted and beloved daughter and granddaughter, our cherished sister/confidante/life buddy, our best-ever aunt, our trusted and loyal friend, proudly Canadian, proudly Jewish, and a lover of Israel, a gifted drummer and percussionist, an inspired businesswoman and negotiator par excellence, a lover and supporter of children, dogs, and endangered animals at home and abroad, a fantastic cook and eating partner, an energetic skier, a passionate believer and supporter of girls' and women's rights and strength to rise up, a sunshine smile, a brave and beautiful heart...

These are but some of the quintessential memories of you that we treasure, Lisa. Ten years have now passed: a decade of standing on the ground without your physical presence. It feels like a century, and it feels like yesterday. We do not get to have you with us as we get older, and we don't get to see you growing older. You did not get to follow your dreams, complete your life's work, or bear the children you so wanted. We miss you more than words can ever say. It is a different life that we live now without you: blessed and good, but still bereft of you. We know now that it will always be thus. Thinking of you helps remind us to find the everyday joys of living...that cup of tea, the setting sun, a comforting dinner, that hand holding ours, that wonderful song just-released, that great book.

We will forever remember how dearly, passionately, and completely you loved life, Lis. Yours was a life that was all about grace, peace, and good will, helping and giving to others near and far. And so it permanently torments everyone who loves you how brutally, violently, and mercilessly your life was taken from you, and you were taken from us. No one ever thinks that such a thing will happen to them. So many lives have been touched by this tragedy of losing you; the ripple effect never ends. Yet there are countless dedicated, exceptional people, at every level of this tragedy, to whom we owe deep thanks for enabling us to continue on. We will never forget that it is because of you and them together that the lives of other women and children in our city and country have been spared.

Our lives have brokenly moved forward, always carrying with us your hopes and heart's dreams for the future. You will live on in the hearts of all our children, and our children's children. We each hold tightly to the memory of special times shared with you, your joyful being, your integrity and humanity, your courageous dignity, and your sparkling eyes, as blue as that crisp Fall sky that we want to hold on to forever. We will always light your Shabbat and Yom Tov candlesticks, along with our own. Like you, they are an essential part of us.

For you, no goal was impossible, no helping hand for a friend too great. We give thanks for the blessing of you in our lives. We know your loving spirit is here with us, ever guiding, ever supporting. It is impossible to say how much we yearn to hold you in our arms and be wrapped up in one of your huge bear hugs. In our dreams, we forever wait for you, with all our love. And we will always remember this, one of your most favourite songs, sung by your most beloved musician. For us, Lis, the song is all about you.

You ask how much I need you Must I explain?
I need you, oh my darling
Like roses need rain

You ask how long I'll love you
I'll tell you true
Until 'The Twelfth of Never'
I'll still be lovin' you

Hold me close
Never let me go
Hold me close
Melt my heart like April snow

I'll love you 'til the bluebells forget to bloom
I'll love you 'til the clover has lost its perfume
I'll love you 'til the poets run outta rhyme
Until 'The Twelfth of Never'
And that's a long, long time
Until 'The Twelfth of Never'
And that's a long, long time.

- With sincerest thanks to Donny Osmond, Jerry Livingston, and Paul Francis Webster

A place to meet and share on campus

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

With only 1,500 square feet, architect Leslie Klein set out to create a warm, inviting space that combines ancient Jewish tradition with modern elements, in the newly redesigned Centre for Jewish Studies at University of Toronto.

The plan was to have a space in the heart of the St. George campus where students and faculty could collaborate and learn from one another.

"The idea was that I want to have one person feel comfortable here, and 40 people," said Klein, an architect for Quadrangle Architects Limited in Toronto, which spearheaded the project.

The centre is in the campus' Jackman Humanities building.

"The university recognized that we needed an address on campus that would allow us to work with our partner units, and all the big humanities programs are in 'his building,'" said the centre's executive director, political science professor Jeffrey Kopstein. "This allows us to have a program that is deeply integrated."

What Kopstein and his team didn't want was a separate Jewish studies building off to the side of the campus. Nor did they want a space that would be overflowing with Jewish symbols and artifacts, since of the 4,000 students who take Jewish studies courses, only about 20 per cent are Jewish, Kopstein said.

The centre has 72 faculty members from various university departments teaching a total of about 91 courses.

While the U of T Jewish studies program was founded in 1967, the Centre for Jewish Studies was not established until 2008. Now that it has been relocated to a central hub on campus, "it's a huge signal that the university's priorities are changing," Kopstein said.

The new Centre for Jewish Studies offers a place for students to meet and study. [Naomi Finlay photo]

But meeting everyone's demands was not easy. Klein had to create enough personalized space for permanent and visiting faculty members, yet leave a large, open area where students could work and hang out.

His design includes a central space with desks along the wall for students, large flexible tables in the centre that can be moved around for various activities, and couches for students who just want to spend time there. Bright, orange chairs, dark wood and glass walls set off the soft bronze and copper toned materials.

"On one level, it reminded us of the design of ancient synagogues, which were actually not theatre style, but more parliamentary style, where people sat on two sides and exchanged ideas across the hall," Klein said.

And unlike in many other faculty headquarters on campus, private offices are not the focal point. Instead, they line the wall, separated from the open space with only a glass partition, partially covered by a layer of palimpsest, paper that has been used several times.

"In ancient times, when paper was not ubiquitous but was actually very valuable, when people wanted to write something, they would reuse old pieces of paper," Klein said. "They would literally scrape off the old ink and reuse [the paper]. And if you scrape off ink time and time again, you don't really lose what was there before but you layer on top of it. We really wanted to emphasize that knowledge is better layering on."

The natural, modern space is a stark contrast to what it looked like before. "It was a very conventional, partitioned 1960s office space," Kopstein said. "It was as if you walked into a bank."

He believes the design has already made a difference in helping the centre achieve its goals.

"I actually teach a class of 1,200 students, so if I have office hours here, there can be about 30 students in here. Where would they normally go? In a normal office building, they would be lined up in the hallway," Kopstein said. "Here, they can sit down, have a coffee, and we actually get Jewish studies majors that way. People get interested. They talk to one another."

"It's part of the changing demographics in Toronto too," he added. "I really think that what Les has done here is allowed us to contribute to the rebirth of downtown Jewish Toronto."

Education key to Israel's security: TAU president

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Education is the key to preserving Israel's strength and competitive edge, says the president of Tel Aviv University, Joseph Klafter.

"No doubt about it," he declared. "Education is the basis of our economic stability and security."

"For a country so lacking in natural resources, human capital is Israel's primary and infinite resource," said Klafter, who holds a PhD in chemistry from Tel Aviv University.

"Israel's security depends on its ability to remain on the cutting edge of research in defence," he noted in an interview last week.

Klafter, who was in Toronto to deliver a lecture at Holy Blossom Temple on higher education, said his university plays an integral role in defence research, a major component of Israel's security.

"We're involved in about 100 defence-oriented projects, many of which are supported by the Ministry of Defence and defence manufacturers," said Klafter, 67, who has been president of Israel's largest university since 2009. "The more sophisticated warfare becomes, the more you depend on research."

"Wars in the future may be conducted from the corridors of research departments," he added.

The university has been instrumental in fostering Israeli government and business ties with important Asian countries such as India and China, Klafter said.

For the past five years, the India-Israel Forum, a body dedicated to enhancing mutual business relations, has convened on the campus of the university.

"We're an interface between Israeli and Indian businessmen," he explained. "We're a bridge."

The university has also signed exchange agreements with several universities in China, and the city of Nanjing has agreed to send thousands of local business executives to take courses in innovation and entrepreneurship on its campus.

With the onset of globalization, Israeli universities have no alternative but to reach out to foreign students, Klafter observed.

At one time, universities in Israel largely cultivated relations with counterparts in North America and Europe. But in recent years, there has been a shift to Asia. "We have contacts with China, India, Japan, Singapore and South Korea," he said.

Klafter, a native of Tel Aviv who was previously chair of the Israel Science Foundation, urged Canadians to study at his university.

"We want more Canadian students to join our English-speaking programs. We have 13 MA and MBA programs in English. Next year, we will offer a degree in electrical engineering in English."

By his estimation, roughly 1,500 of its 30,000 students complete their degree in only English.

Klafter suggested his university is still recovering from draconian government cutbacks that forced it to trim faculty staff from 1,300 to 900 and adversely affected research activities and the teacher-student ratio.

Describing this austerity period as "the lost decade," he said the government has begun to invest more in high education in the last two years.

Klafter expressed concern that academic standards in Israeli high schools have declined, at least as judged by scores in various tests in an array of disciplines.

He is also concerned that the number of Israeli students studying the hard sciences is decreasing. These developments can be ascribed to fundamental demographic changes in Israeli society, he said.

Simply put, there are fewer secular Israelis and more haredim today.

According to Klafter, the situation is not hopeless.

The Israeli government should ensure that haredi students take mandatory courses in English, the humanities and science.

Teaching programs can be improved, said Klafter, adding that the university is already working on this problem.

The university also encourages haredim to study at its satellite campus in Bnei Brak, a religious enclave in greater Tel Aviv. Currently, haredi women enrolled there are taking courses in nursing, communications and social studies.

SUPPORT FOR ISRAEL: York University, students walked from the Hillel Lounge to Vari Hall, then gathered in a circle and said a prayer for the people of Israel on Nov. 15. They dressed in red shirts to represent tzeva adom (red alert) and held signs representing the different cities and towns under attack. Israeli flags were waved proudly and students proclaimed "We are all red!"

UJA Federation improved relations with Israelis, GA told

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Seven years ago, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto changed its approach to the Israeli community in Toronto, and the results have been "incredibly rewarding," according to Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of the federation.

Speaking Nov. 13 in Baltimore at the General Assembly of the Jewish Federations of North America, Sokolsky said that after an initial small meeting with members of the local Israeli community, he spent about a year apologizing for "paternalistic attitudes" and "our inability to understand our fellow Jews and the challenges of Israelis living abroad in a very cold community."

The concept of "integration" of Israelis was a false start, he added.

Instead of considering Toronto's sizeable Israeli community a challenge, Sokolsky said Israelis living here are "allies" who share goals and values with the larger Jewish community, including Zionism, a strong connection with Israel, concern about their children's Jewish identity, and a belief in Jewish peoplehood.

Jewish Agency chair Natan Sharansky, in a brief address at the end of the session, went further. He called Israelis in the Diaspora "a special group which God sent us. They live in America, but their identity is defined by Israel. That's exactly what you want to do with Jews of America... It's so good that we have people to help us connect these two worlds."

The session was co-sponsored by UJA Federation and the Reut Institute, and moderated by journalist Shmuel Rosner, a senior fellow of the Jewish People Policy Institute.

Sokolsky said that, even before the federation reached out, Israelis in Toronto had been attending events such as rallies for Israel and the annual Walk with Israel. "What was our response?" - "Are they giving to the campaign?"

But, as it turned out, the federation's relations with Israelis has been "a metaphor for everything else we had to do" in the wider Jewish community, where "maybe 25 or 30 per cent" are UJA contributors, he said.

Two years ago, the Toronto federation hosted the first ever gathering of Israeli leadership abroad, noted Eran Shayson. Reut's director of national security and global affairs. He called Toronto "a very interesting model" because of the federation's invitation to local Israeli leaders "to participate and contribute from within."

He noted that many Israeli immigrants are suspicious of the Jewish establishment in their new communities and tend, especially at the beginning, to gravitate toward "little Israels, like any other immigrant community."

Panelist Noa Eliasof-Shoham, a board member of the JCC in Palo Alto, Calif., said that as an Israeli immigrant, she's decided "not to live out of my suitcases," but to live in Palo Alto as if she would live there forever.

Fellow panelist Yael Karol - chair of the Israel division of Toronto's UJA campaign, and the first Israeli fellow of Toronto's Joshua Institute for Jewish Communal Leadership - immigrated as a teenager and said she's been in Toronto so long that it is her home. "For me, the important thing is to create a culture where people feel they are part of the general community, like I feel a part of mine."

She credited Sokolsky and the federation, as well as Toronto's immediate past Israeli consul general Amir Gissin and his successor, DJ Schneeweiss, for creating "the conditions to make it work... They're not telling us what to do. They're listening to our voice."

For Israelis, "recognizing that we're here and we're not temporary any more" is the beginning of building community, added panelist Shawn Evenhaim, chair of the board of the Los Angeles-based Israeli Leadership Council.

Many Israelis who think they will return to Israel in a couple of years stay longer. Eliasof-Shoham pointed out. But she believes that "if you do go back, you get so much out of (becoming involved in the community), and your kids get so much out of it. For me, it's like giving my kids an insurance policy (against assimilation)."

Karol said the goals of the programs in Toronto are to build leadership and create venues where Israelis can "speak Hebrew and be exposed to Hebrew culture, but also be exposed to other programs in the community."

Heard at the GA...

"I always believe life is made not of years, but of moments."

Elie Wiesel, author and Nobel Peace Prize winner

"For me, it's a good sign you can have a packed room (at the GA) to listen to young adults."

Wayne Firestone, president and CEO, Hillel

"Hearing Elie Wiesel and Natan Sharansky made me feel 17 again. My husband Joe and I had our first date at a Soviet Jewry rally."

Linda Kislowicz, CEO, Jewish Federations of Canada - UJA

"Parents forget to tell their children about themselves, about their struggles, how they changed history... I don't care if they tell about me. Tell them about themselves, how they went to Russia, made demonstrations."

Natan Sharansky, chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel

"It's really important, the work we do. It's a privilege."
Mindy Eklove, national director of young leadership, Jewish Federations of Canada - UJA

"[Jewish newspapers] are one of the last neutral forums in Jewish life right now... Our paper forces different members of the community, in a sense, to confront each other and learn from each other: Orthodox, Reform, secular, feminists - however you define a community."

Andrew Silow-Carroll, editor-in-chief/CEO, New Jersey Jewish News

"We're part of (Klal Yisrael,) something much larger than an organization, congregation or even a denomination."

Leaders respond to Israel-Gaza conflict

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
 Staff Reporter

As fighting continued between Hamas and Israel over the weekend, Canadian and world leaders issued responses to the conflict.

On Parliament Hill, leaders of the government and opposition parties all commented on the situation.

Late last week, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird reaffirmed Canada's support of Israel's right to protect itself against "terrorist threats."

"Far too often, the Jewish People find themselves on the front lines in the struggle against terrorism, the great struggle of our generation," he said. "Canada condemns the terrorist group Hamas and stands with Israel as it deals with regional threats to peace and security."

Leader of the Opposition, New Democratic Party MP Thomas Mulcair, released a Nov. 15 statement asking both Israel and Hamas to exercise "restraint" and to "respect international humanitarian law obligations to protect civilians at all times."

He also asked the Canadian government to "pursue a balanced and constructive approach in the Middle East."

Bob Rae, interim leader of the Liberal party, called on Hamas to halt all rocket attacks on Israel, indicating the Liberal position is that the Gaza-based entity was responsible for provoking the Jewish state via its frequent barrages against Israel for more than a year.

"The terrorist group Hamas must take responsibility for these acts of violence out of Gaza and order them to stop," Rae said in a Nov. 14 statement. "We recognize Israel's right to defend its population, and we also urge that parties involved take all possible steps to protect civilian life and work to implement a ceasefire."

Canadian Jewish community representatives also weighed in on the escalating the situation in Israel.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' (CIJA) CEO Shimon Fogel said his organization was happy to see "cross-partisan support" for Israel.

"Sadly, the constant missile fire from Hamas has proven not only a threat to Israelis, but a threat to the Palestinians themselves. Hamas has a choice – it can remain committed to its fantasy of destroying the Jewish state, or it can choose the path of peace and take constructive steps to build a future for the Palestinians," he told The CJN.

The centre also sent out a first-person update via e-mail on Nov. 17, from its Jerusalem-based office director, David Weinberg.

In it, Weinberg describes living through numerous Code Red missile alerts in Israel over the weekend.

Up until last week, Jerusalem had never been targeted by Israel's enemies. Hamas fired a missile at it last Friday.

"People in Jerusalem, Ma'aleh Adumim and Gush Etzion were shocked to hear the 'Code Red' missile warning sirens go off Friday evening as Shabbat began. The missile fell near my brother's home in Tekoa in the Gush Etzion bloc of settlements south of Jerusalem," he wrote.

Weinberg added that Israel's national hospital, the Sheba Medical Center at Tel Hashomer, was placed on emergency standby and had activated a series of underground bombproof operating rooms and a maternity ward.

"Dozens of doctors have been called-up for reserve duty in the army, and the IDF has stationed 50 of its paramedical staff at the hospital to help out with the [expected] incoming wounded," he added, noting that as of the weekend, most Israelis anticipated the IDF to begin a ground campaign in Gaza.

Rockets shatter calm throughout the Negev

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

BE'ER SHEVA — To uninitiated neophytes like us, it didn't sound anything like a rocket, but perhaps this was only because we had no clue what a rocket actually sounded like.

Participants in a Ben-Gurion University (BGU) global media mission that included The CJN, the Jewish Chronicle of London and the National Post, gave each other a "What was that?" look around 2 p.m. on Nov. 11, when a loud, unmistakable thud interrupted our note-taking deep inside a building at BGU's Marcus Family Campus in Be'er Sheva.

But the sound didn't fool Ehud Zion-Waldoks, BGU's liaison to the foreign press. Like so many others living in this city of 200,000 in the Negev Desert, he immediately started to make calls to family members to inquire about their safety.

The building's concrete was thick, so thick that only one or two people in the room actually discerned the faint echo of an air raid siren that would subside within seconds. Anyway, by then it was too late, long past the 15 seconds people usually had to start heading to the bomb shelters that dot the town and campus.

Be'er Sheva and the campus had often been targeted by Hamas rockets from

When the sirens were heard in Kiryat Malachi last week, people ran to the shelters. [Israel Sun photo]

Gaza — although the particular one we heard missed by a long shot — and the incident we experienced foreshadowed the Israel Defence Forces' Nov. 14 killing of Hamas leader Ahmed Jabari and its subsequent massive strikes against Hamas targets in Gaza just as our mission was drawing to a close.

Still, we got a close-up view of the sense of vulnerability and dread that Israelis feel when those sirens go off and they don't know what's going to fall from the sky.

As we spent time on BGU's main campus for the first couple of days, sirens sounded several times in Be'er Sheva.

A sheet of paper placed in our campus guest rooms while we were out instructed us on "correct behaviour during rocket and mortar attacks."

For the rest of the week, the media mission took part in a biannual BGU conference on "Dryland, Deserts and Desertification" at the university's Sde Boker campus, located 40 kilometres from the Marcus campus, and Zion-Waldoks continued to keep us updated.

He let us know that Israel's Iron Dome anti-missile program had successfully blown a couple of rockets out of the sky, but the news was not always good: three civilians were killed by Hamas rockets in the southern Israeli town of Kiryat Malachi, and Hamas continued to aim at Be'er Sheva. Four years earlier, the city faced massive bombardment.

Because of the developments, BGU shut down its classes on Nov. 15, but it was due to re-open Nov. 19 for employees.

On the bus that ferried media and conference-goers from site to site, Zion-Waldoks approached media mission participants individually Nov. 14 to inform them about the hit on Jabari and what that might mean in terms of retaliation by Hamas.

On the evening of Nov. 14 at the Mashabim Holiday Village at Kibbutz Mashabei Sadeh, where we stayed for our final three nights, we and conference-goers were told that even though the night might be punctuated by air raid sirens, we could rest assured that we were out of striking distance.

But safely ensconced in our rooms minutes later, we heard the sirens once again.

Please send good vibes

Everyone checks in on how the other is holding up, some reminisce about the Gulf War, and then, after the "boom," we all place bets on whether it was a rocket that exploded or one shot down by the Iron Dome.

I want to cry every time my two-year-old son turns to me in the stairwell and says, "Now comes the boom." Just two years old and he already knows about war.

If you want the real news about what's happening, where the loudest booms were heard or who has been called up to reserves, you log into social media. Whereas I've always been a news geek, since Operation Pillar of Defence started, I'm constantly checking up on the latest news tidbits. Social media outdoes the regular media by far for real-time news. It's also the only place to get updated after a rocket attack on Tel Aviv, as the phone lines get jammed up.

Listening to the radio for music has also become impossible. Announcers interrupt songs to broadcast where a siren is currently being sounded. On television, there's a running ticker that announces where sirens are being sounded around the country. When there's a report, even if there's a tagline that the siren we're hearing is a recorded one, we've been jolted off the sofa in alarm wondering if it's a new, real one.

Everyone knows someone who has been called up. Israel's army, unlike Canada's, is made up of its civilian population. People are called up to reserve duty in the middle of their lives and long after they've finished mandatory service as 20-somethings. From our circle of friends alone, five fathers/husbands have been called up.

Let me share this anecdote: A's fifth birthday party took place in the backyard of her grandparents' home in a quiet, upscale north Tel Aviv neighbourhood on Saturday morning. It was great fun for the kids — a science-themed party with someone making putty and doing dry ice tricks. Just after the cake, A's father went into the house and came out wearing his army uniform. He bid his family farewell, said goodbye to the guests, and left for reserve duty. The party continued. Schools have made adjustments, too. We decided that because the daycare and kindergarten classrooms have a safe room (bomb shelter), our three kids would attend school until Home Front Command says otherwise. The teachers held a drill for the kids, and they follow safety measures when a real siren sounds. Our kids return home with stories of the funny songs they sang in the bomb shelter. In the evening, we get an email from the teachers explaining how the day went.

Our children have noticed that we're constantly checking for news updates, but we've tried to censor what they know about Operation Pillar of Defence.

In the kindergarten, it seems, other kids know a lot more. Our five-year-old son came home talking about the Asians wanting to throw rockets on us (Gaza, in Hebrew is Aza, but he misheard). I find it depressing that my kids know about rockets other than those headed for outer space. And they're unsettled in other ways. Our new bedtime routine includes many return visits to the kids' beds to comfort them, even after we've said good night. They also wake us up at night.

In addition, we now have extra bottles of water, an emergency light and other supplies at the ready — as well as five gas masks I hope we'll never have to use.

Please send good vibes toward this region. We need them.

Israeli youth dance troupe heckled in Britain

JTA

BIRMINGHAM, England — Anti-Israel protesters disrupted a performance by the youth troupe of Israel's BatSheva Dance Company in Birmingham, England.

One protester was arrested for racial harassment after using a racial slur about Jews toward a ticket holder outside the venue before the Nov. 13 evening performance, the Jewish Chronicle of London reported. He was later released at the request of the victim.

Five other protesters were removed from the audience for disturbing the performance. They shouted slogans such as "Free free Palestine" and "From the river to the sea, Palestine will be free."

Birmingham was the fourth stop in England for the troupe, which had been picketed and disrupted at each venue.

The Nov. 13 protest was organized by the British Committee for the Universities of Palestine and by Sue Blackwell, an anti-Israel academic and former lecturer in English at the University of Birmingham, according to the Chronicle.

A performance scheduled for Brighton was cancelled due to the high cost of security.

Anti-Israel rally outside Rome shul

JTA

ROME — Protesters chanted antisemitic and pro-Palestinian slogans outside the main Rome synagogue during mass student protests that turned violent.

Tens of thousands of people in dozens of Italian cities reportedly took part in strikes and demonstrations Nov. 14 protesting the economic situation and other issues.

In Rome, thousands of high school and university students staged marches through the city centre, blocking traffic. Police reportedly chased some marchers into the old Jewish Quarter.

Rome Jewish community president Riccardo Pacifici said that some of the demonstrators waved Palestinian flags while hooting and shouting anti-Jewish slogans outside the Great Synagogue of Rome.

"It has been 30 years since a demonstration passed in front of the synagogue," Pacifici said. "Who authorized it?"

The newspaper La Repubblica reported that in clashes outside the synagogue with police, some demonstrators hurled stone vases that were standing in front of the building.

The synagogue has been closely guarded, with police cars sitting on the street outside, ever since a Palestinian terror attack in 1982 that killed a toddler and left scores injured. Dozens of police were stationed outside the synagogue during the Nov. 14 demonstrations.

A student representative told La Repubblica that the police guards added to the tension.

He said some protesters had probably shouted pro-Palestinian slogans, but he denied media reports that the demonstrators shouted "Saddam, Saddam," referring to the Iraqi leader captured by U.S. forces in 2003 and later executed.

Rockets fired during ceasefire
Palestinian militants reportedly fired 21 rockets from Gaza into Israel during a unilateral ceasefire last Friday called by Israel to facilitate a visit to Gaza by Egypt's prime minister. Israel briefly suspended its attacks on Gaza on Friday, the third day of Israel's operation Pillar of Defence against Hamas, at the behest of Egypt ahead of an impromptu solidarity visit by Egyptian Prime Minister Hisham Kandil, an Israeli official told the news site Ynet. Four of the rockets fired during the Egyptian prime minister's visit were intercepted over Ashdod by Israel's Iron Dome missile defence system. The remaining 17 landed in and around Ashkelon and Kiryat Gat. Israeli aircraft resumed their attacks late Friday morning.

Arafat not poisoned, doctor says

A leading French doctor who teaches at the Paris hospital where Yasser Arafat died in 2004 told The Times of Israel, based on Arafat's medical report, that there is "absolutely no way" the Palestinian leader was poisoned. Dr. Roland Masse, a member of the prestigious Académie de Médecine who teaches radiopathology at Percy Military Training Hospital in Clamart, where Arafat was hospitalized two weeks before his death on Nov. 11, 2004, said the symptoms of polonium poisoning would have been "impossible to miss." He noted that the hospital had tested Arafat for radiation poisoning. The hospital specializes in the related field of radiation detection. A group of scientists is set to take samples for testing from Arafat's body, which was exhumed last week in Ramallah.

Islamic Jihad leaders killed in strike

JTA

JERUSALEM — As the Hamas leader in exile Khaled Meshal rejected a halt to bombings last Monday, Israeli airstrikes hit a Gaza media centre and killed several leaders of the terrorist group Islamic Jihad.

The Israel Air Force's strike Monday evening — the second on the centre in two days — killed Ramaz Harab, a top leader of Islamic Jihad's military wing, the Al-Quds Brigades. At least three other Islamic Jihad leaders were in the building when it was hit, according to the Israel Defence Forces.

Hamas' main television station, Al-Aqsa, is located on the top floor of the high-rise building.

In Cairo, meanwhile, Meshal said Monday during an hour-long news conference, "Whoever started the war must end it."

He told reporters that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had requested a ceasefire, a claim that Israel has denied, according to reports.

Meshal said there is a new spirit of co-operation among Palestinian factions as a result of the Israeli operation, which began on Nov. 14.

"Israel is the common enemy. Confrontation with the enemy is our moment of truth," he said. "We must end the political divide and unite around common institutions and around resistance to Israel. Our enemy cannot be treated with words, but only by force. No concessions should be made with Israel, given the new atmosphere in the Arab world."

Meanwhile, communities in southern Israel were still under a steady barrage of rockets on Monday. The Israeli military said it inflicted "severe damage on the rocket-launching capabilities of terror organizations" as its Operation Pillar of Defence neared the end of its first week.

At least 50 rockets were fired from Gaza toward southern Israel on Monday through the early afternoon. A woman in Ashkelon was wounded by rocket fragments while searching for a bomb shelter. Rockets fell in Sderot, Ashkelon, Ofakim and Shaar Hanegev. The Iron Dome missile defence system intercepted other rockets over those communities and over Be'er Sheva.

Overnight Sunday, the Israel Defence Forces targeted some 80 of what it called "terror sites" throughout the Gaza Strip, including underground rocket-launching sites, tunnels and training bases, "inflicting severe damage to the rocket-launching capabilities of terror organizations operating out of the Gaza Strip," according to an IDF spokesman.

The IDF also targeted buildings owned by senior terrorist operatives used as command posts and weapons storage facilities, it said. Also targeted were rocket-launching squads as they prepared to fire rockets toward Israel.

More than 90 Palestinians — terrorists and civilians — have been killed since the start of the operation on Nov. 14, according to the IDF. Three Israelis have been killed.

More than 540 rockets have fallen inside Israel in the six days since the start of Pillar of Defence, all but 35 in non-residential areas. Iron Dome has intercepted some 320 of them, the IDF said.

Iron Dome saves many lives

Sean Savage and Israel Hayom

TEL AVIV — With hundreds of rockets raining down from Gaza, Israel's Iron Dome missile defence system has saved an untold number of lives thanks to Israeli technological ingenuity and U.S. support.

According to the figures from the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), since Operation Pillar of Defence began Nov. 14, the Iron Dome system has intercepted some 300 rockets, with an 85 per cent interception success rate.

"The system works incredibly well, even beyond our expectations," said David Schechter, a top official at Rafael Advanced Defense Systems, the Israeli defence company that designed and manufactures the system.

One of the keys to success for the Iron Dome system is that it isn't designed to shoot down every rocket, but only those that threaten civilian areas.

"They didn't design a system that would shoot down everything," Jeff White, a military analyst with the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, told Bloomberg News. "They designed a system that would shoot down threat rockets, and it works pretty good."

The Iron Dome provides city-sized coverage against rockets with ranges between five to 70 kilometres using a highly advanced radar system. The first Iron Dome battery was deployed outside of Be'er Sheva in March 2011. Currently, there are five batteries deployed, with the latest one coming two months ahead of schedule on Nov. 17 to protect Tel Aviv. Five more batteries will be deployed in the upcoming years.

The Iron Dome system does not come without steep financial costs, especially in comparison to Hamas' crude rockets. Each battery costs $100 million (all figures Cdn) and each interceptor missile costs $50,000. By contrast, the cost to the Israeli economy of each civilian fatality is estimated to be $1.2 million.

While initially funded by Israel, the United States has provided most of the funding for additional batteries. Since 2010, the Obama administration and Congress have provided $205 million with an additional $70 million on its way.

According to a White House press release, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called President Barack Obama Nov. 16 and expressed "deep appreciation" for U.S. investment in the system.

The Iron Dome is part of a larger Israeli missile defence system. Israel's other systems include the upcoming David's Sling, designed for medium-range rockets and missiles, and the Arrow, designed to intercept longer-range missiles such as from Iran.

A number of IDF officials were involved in the decision to deploy the fifth Iron Dome battery to the Tel Aviv area ahead of schedule, though the main force pushing the move was Israel Air Defence commander Brig.-Gen. Shahar Shohat.

For the installation and command of the fifth battery Nov. 17, Maj. Itamar Abo was called away from his university studies, having finished commanding one of the other batteries just a month and a half ago. The new unit involves more advanced technology, so Abo and his team were given updated training.

Soon after the installation of that new battery, it intercepted its first rocket. Abo said, "The feeling during the interception is incredible, especially in the Dan region [around Tel Aviv] with so many citizens."

"It demands a high level of professional concentration," Abo continued. "There is a sense [of concentration] among all the people involved, from the low-ranking technicians to the warriors that actually shoot, and it is rare to actually see the missile hit the target. There is nothing that makes us happier, however. The battery has been very successful up to now, and we hope it will continue to be successful in the future."

Due to its more advanced technology than the other four units, the fifth Iron Dome is better able to deal with Fajr and eight-inch rockets launched from Gaza. The sixth Iron Dome is slated to be ready by the middle of 2013.

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak visited the Iron Dome battery on Sunday in the central Dan region. He called it "an exceptional achievement by both the Air Defence Command and manufacturers."

"No other army in any country in the world has a system like it. No other civilian population has this protection," Barak said. "It is true that the threat against us is unique, but such abilities and defensive achievements are out of the ordinary," Barak said.

"With the Iron Dome and the developments that are planned for it, we have a basic ability to protect the State of Israel against most threats of both short- and long-range missiles. It will take a few years and a few million shekels, but we will get there."

Israel uses social media to spread Gaza message

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Whether it succeeds in stopping Hamas rocket attacks on southern Israel, Operation Pillar of Defense will be notable for the fierce use by both sides of social media.

Twitter, Facebook and the blogosphere are all being pressed into service to win hearts and minds around the world.

As of late last week, Israel seemed to be ahead. Of the top trending tweets on Twitter, the second-most popular tweet subject in the world was #HamasBumperStickers — a crowd-sourced collection of tragicomic lines condemning the Gaza terror group. One example: "It takes 2.58" nuts and bolts to put a car together; — and only one Hamas nut to have it scattered all over the road." #HamasBumperStickers was beating out #PrayerGaza, the preferred hashtag for the anti-Israel crowd on Twitter.

Official Israel — the Israel Defence Forces, the Prime Minister's Office, and other groups — has long used Twitter and Facebook to get their message out, and pro-Israel social-media users did the same using their own accounts. A message sent out on Twitter, or a comment posted on an article that gets picked up by a popular news aggregator such as Matt Drudge, could be seen by hundreds of thousands of people.

In order to make sure that Israel's side is heard loud and clear, Public Diplomacy and Diaspora Affairs Minister Yuli Edelstein has been co-ordinating a vast online activist effort, recruiting social-media users around the world to spread Israel's message in time of need. The Operations Center has been sending out material — videos, photos, eyewitness reports — to about 25,000 people around the world on the centre's mailing list, and they have been moving those messages to the rest of the world on a plethora of social-media platforms and in dozens of languages.

In fact, the IDF more or less used Twitter to declare war. Not long after top Hamas terrorist Ahmed Jabari was killed in an IDF missile attack last Wednesday, the army tweeted the event and uploaded a video showing the missile strike. Later, the IDF posted a message on Twitter saying that it recommended that "all Hamas activists, whatever their rank, to not show their faces in the coming days."

To which Hamas responded in its own Twitter feed that its "holy hands will reach your leaders and soldiers no matter where they are. You yourselves have opened up the gates of hell."

Since then, the cyber battle has been taken up by supporters of both sides. Pro-Israel tweeters and bloggers are concentrating on the suffering of residents of the south, showing videos and photos of destroyed homes and shattered lives. For the other side, the theme has been general condemnation of Israel for attacking "innocent women and children."

In the past, Israel's achievements in social media have been spotty, but this time, said Edelstein, Israel had a winning formula.

"We are here in order to expose the unbearable reality of the residents in the south and the necessity for military action against Hamas and the [other] terrorist organizations," he said. "I am certain that alongside us will stand significant force multipliers in the form of tens of thousands of activists in Jewish communities around the world."

Israel is using social media to show how people in the south are living under Hamas rockets. Seen here is a house that received a direct hit. [Israel Sun photo]

Company trains mice to react to explosives

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Birds know when a storm is coming, and dogs can sense when their masters are feeling down. Scientists have long known that animals display emotions in response to external stimuli. Now an Israeli company has trained mice to respond when they detect explosives, alerting security officers at airport and mall security checkpoints.

The system, called Bio-Explorer, was developed by Israel's Tamar Group, which specializes in designing detonation systems for construction and quarrying, training personnel to handle explosives safely, and detecting and neutralizing explosives. The system uses specially trained mice that are conditioned to react when they "smell" explosives, drugs, or other contraband. The mice are equipped with biological sensors that detect changes in their heart rate, breathing, and other factors. Sensors upload the bio-data to a computer. When something untoward is detected, the system alerts inspectors or security officers, who can then take the requisite steps.

The system was introduced for the first time at the recent International Conference on Homeland Security in Tel Aviv. Dozens of top security officials from countries around the world attended, along with mayors, police officials, heads of security agencies, and businesspeople in the homeland security business. The conference was sponsored by the Israel Export Institute, along with the Homefront Security Ministry, Defence Ministry, Industry, Labor, and Trade Ministry, and Foreign Ministry.

The visitors saw innovative technologies like that of the Tamar Group, said CEO Boaz Hayun. "Animals' senses are far more well developed than humans', and more well developed than even the most advanced security sensors created by man," he said.

"Our system takes animals and turns them into biological sensors, using specially trained laboratory mice and measuring their reactions to outside stimuli. They are placed at the entry point in a security checkpoint or installation, and when they detect something that appears suspicious, the sensor records their physical reactions and communicates it to a computer that analyzes the data and alerts security personnel."

Hayun said that the system has been under development for six years, and that the company is developing specialized products for use in various scenarios: air and ship cargo, agricultural shipments, vehicle inspections, and others. "We believe this product will have a major impact on the homeland security market," said Hayun.

That market is growing, said Ofer Zaks, CEO of the Israel Export Institute, a division of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor that helps Israeli companies break into markets overseas.

"The rate of growth in the homeland security market in recent years has been 6.5 per cent annually, and in 2011 total worldwide investments in homeland security products, technology, and training was $188 billion (all figures US)."

By 2020, said Zaks, the market will be worth $330 billion annually. There's no reason Israel can't take a decent chunk of that market. "The conference will help cement Israel as a major brand in homeland security technology," he said, "with an emphasis on Israel's technological capabilities and experience in dealing with terrorism."

The conference featured seminars and discussions about all aspects of homeland security in the 21st century, including cybersecurity, "smart cities," infrastructure protection, and homefront security.

Users track 'Sderot experience' on iPhone

Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — A new iPhone app enables users to keep track of Palestinian rocket fire from Gaza on southern Israel by sending a notification whenever an alert is sounded.

The application, which is not an official warning system, is the brainchild of 13-year-old Be'er Sheva resident Liron Bar, who provides constant reports on missile attack warnings, known as Color Red alerts, and strikes in the south on his Facebook page as well.

Application developer Kobi Snir volunteered to develop the free app, which sends a notification in Hebrew to iPhone users every time there is an air raid warning of a rocket attack from Gaza. Another volunteer, Yossi Yifrah, provides the updates.

Depending on their distance from Gaza, residents of the south of Israel have as little as 15 seconds to run for cover from the time of the Color Red alert until a missile lands. Each time a Color Red notification reaches a phone, the app sounds an alert and displays the number of seconds that have passed since the missile-warning siren.

The app is in no way a substitute for the official Color Red alerts and air raid warning systems that are sounded in areas under attack. However, the application does enable those living beyond the missiles' ranges to get a taste of life in the south.

Filmmaker introduces Israeli artists to Canada

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Igal Hecht's show, Muzika, has returned for a second season, bringing a new batch of Israeli music to North American ears.

The weekly program, which airs both in Canada and the United States, introduces Israeli musicians from all genres. The show includes interviews with the artists and performances.

"It doesn't pretend to be anything else but a straightforward biography show about Israeli musicians, celebrating Israeli culture and music," said Hecht, the Israeli-born creator of the show.

New in the 26-episode second season is a spotlight on the English music scene in Israel. To fit with this theme, Hecht said he likes to ask the musicians why they decided to sing in English.

"I asked them and they all hate that question," he said. "What I could gauge is the fact that they want to break out internationally."

Although the musicians love Israel, and they want to continue performing in Israel, singing in English allows them to reach broader audiences. One example is Ninette, who won the first season of Kokhav Nolad, based on the British reality show Pop Idol. She wants to break out of the Israeli market, Hecht said, but understands she can't do it if she's only singing in Hebrew.

"The world is a very small place. You can become very famous from a musical perspective, if you're good and if it catches on," he said, for example, through the use of YouTube. "[These artists are] talented, they have something to say, and they have a unique sound."

Apart from dreams of world stardom, many of today's young Israelis are heavily influenced by English music from Britain and the United States, which might make them want to incorporate that into their own music.

Filming this season was a bit different from the last, Hecht said. The first time, Hecht and his cameraman,

Lior Cohen, visited the artists in their homes to record the interviews. But this season, they were under much tighter time constraints, so they rented a studio, and only went off-site for three or four locations, he said.

"It didn't have the intimacy factor of going to someone's living room and having them play for us," he said, "but we still had great moments."

Hecht said one of his favourite parts of the show is the moment he meets the musician, especially when it's one of the artist he listened to when he was growing up. Israeli singer Arik Sinai stands out for him.

"He came in with these yellow puffy pants," Hecht said. "He just came on, and said, 'Hey guys.' He had this raspy voice. 'Can I have a cigarette before we start?'"

Although Hecht has become known for his documentaries focusing on the politics of Israel, he said he wanted people to know that there's much more to the country than just its politics.

"Muzika came and forced me to focus just on culture as opposed to politics," he said. "Muzika is just about music – celebrating Israeli musicians, and celebrating Israeli music of all genres."

Hecht emphasized that Muzika is not just a show for Jewish people. It doesn't focus on gossip, nor does it try to change the world, he said. It's strictly a show meant to entertain.

"If people want to have a break and enjoy good music half an hour a week, this is the show for them," he said. "If people enjoy good music, they'll enjoy the show."

Muzika airs Sundays at 6:30 p.m. on CTS.

Israeli director used to be a financial analyst

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

It has been a long and winding road for Yaron Zilberman, an Israeli, New York City-based film director.

Zilberman, whose first feature film, A Late Quartet, opens here on Nov. 23 after its premiere at the Toronto International Film Festival in September, was a financial analyst before turning to his first love, film-making.

"All my life I wanted to do something in the world of art," said Zilberman, who was born in Haifa, the scion of sabras whose ancestors arrived in Israel from eastern Europe several generations ago. "The trouble was, I could not find a pathway into it."

Now 46, he achieved his ambition when he made his first movie, Watermarks, released in 2004.

Watermarks – a documentary about the legendary Jewish sports club Hakoah Vienna – was co-produced by two major players, HBO and Arte, enjoyed successful theatrical releases in North America and elsewhere and won a slew of industry awards. Yet Zilberman still could not make a go of it as a filmmaker.

A veteran of the Israel Defence Forces and a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who earned academic degrees in physics and operations research, he finished his studies in the mid-1990s.

For almost two years, he was employed as an analyst by a Wall Street investment bank. "It was fascinating, an amazing and incredible experience, but it was not for me. I was handsomely compensated, but it was not what I was looking for in life. Mentally, I had reached a dead end, and had to move on."

So he worked as a real estate developer, constructing two residential buildings in Tel Aviv, and as an Internet startup specialist in Israel.

It was then that he realized that he had to turn his life around completely. And so, in 2002, he started working on Watermarks, which tells the story of a group of female swimmers at Hakoah Vienna, which dominated national competitions in Austria for a generation until the club was closed by the Nazis in 1938.

Zilberman found these women, now in their 80s living on three continents, and convinced them to attend a reunion in Vienna. In the film, they share memories and swim together once more in the pool they once shared.

"They impressed me," he recalled. "They were smart and funny. I was intrigued by them."

Watermarks, he observed, was a homage to these remarkable women and Hakoah's athletes down through the decades.

Christopher Walken, Catherine Keener and Seymour Hoffman in A Late Quartet.

"In the face of open bigotry, they defiantly set out to be the best. They excelled because they were dedicated and united."

In making A Late Quartet, a film about a famed New York City string quartet struggling to survive after its founder announces his impending resignation, Zilberman used the same techniques that served him so well in Watermarks.

"What I learned at university about being focused, mastering the fundamentals and taking a serious approach to research was incredibly useful."

Nonetheless, the transition he made from documentary filmmaker in Watermarks to feature film director in A Late Quartet was substantial. "It was a big jump," he said. "I had to re-learn the craft from A to Z."

Raising funds for A Late Quartet, produced by his wife, Tamar Sela, the mother of his two children, was a time-consuming process.

But investors liked the script, based on a story by Zilberman, and the concept of structuring a film around the magical tones of Beethoven's String Quartet No. 14 in C minor, Opus 131, which unfolds in seven movements played without a break, was a selling point, too.

And they were thrilled by the cast, which stars Christopher Walken, Philip Seymour Hoffman, Catherine Keener, Imogen Poots and Mark Ivanir, an Israeli actor.

By conventional Hollywood standards, A Late Quartet is an unusual film. At once serious-minded and seething, with uncontrollable passions, it is esthetically and artistically satisfying. The New York Times praised it as a "deeply felt, musically savvy film."

When the earnest founder of the string quartet (Walken) receives a life-changing medical diagnosis, he informs his colleagues of his intention to step down. With this out-of-the-blue announcement, competing egos and suppressed emotions are released.

"It was a challenge creating this world," said Zilberman, who plays the cello, appreciates chamber music and loves Beethoven.

A Late Quartet, he acknowledged, will not appeal to movie-goers who revel in violence, mayhem and sex, the standard ingredients of hackneyed Hollywood movies. "It's more for an intelligent, sophisticated viewer who's interested in the relationship between music and drama, though I wouldn't mind a young, teenage audience."

Insights from a woman without sight

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Laurie Rubin is a young, Jewish opera singer who lives in Hawaii with her partner. She boasts her own jewelry line, the LR Look, has a postgraduate degree and a remarkable operatic portfolio. Oh, and she happens to be blind.

The author of Do You Dream in Color? (Seven Stories Press, $18.95). Rubin has penned a memoir that describes her life, her determination to succeed and the discovery of her operatic talent. This is a woman who has refused to allow her blindness to interfere with her goal. It's also meant working that much harder than everyone else to transform those goals into reality.

Her book is riveting, and readers will find themselves cheering for her victories and feeling her pain when peers and instructors dismiss her or treat her as if she is invisible or "less-than" her sighted contemporaries.

"Do You Dream in Color?" shows the same clarity, honesty, and down-to-earth that Laurie has always had with her art. A wonderful book."
—FREDERICKA WYN, PRADA, world-renowned mezzo-soprano

Do You Dream in Color? insights from a girl without sight

Laurie Rubin

"My biggest goal for this book was to share with people how I do everything from navigating New York City independently, making jewelry, to following a conductor on the great concert stages, as a way of showing that a great many things can be achieved without the use of sight," she reflects.

"I've sensed over the years that people really do want to understand what my life is like, but they are afraid to ask questions. The book is a way to open people's minds to the vast array of abilities that people with disabilities do have, thus making people like me valuable, employable and significant contributors to society."

Rubin's achievements are nothing short of inspiring, but so is her talent and her sheer zest for life. She became bat mitzvah, learning her Torah portion by braille, and she learned to cook. She has performed on stage with other operatic stars and honed and trained her exquisite voice – winning many awards along the way.

Do You Dream in Color reveals Rubin's personality with an honesty that is refreshing and beautiful. It also illustrates her adamant refusal to slip into the shadows and be ignored.

"I'd love to be known for being an artist who works hard to create meaningful interpretations of pieces, and as someone who can open the doors for other blind people where they might have been closed in society before," she says. "I want to be known for the mark I've made on the world, not for any supposed courage I have for just facing the world."

Philip Roth calls it a day

ITA

The publisher for Philip Roth confirmed that the Pulitzer Prize-winning American Jewish novelist is retiring from writing.

The Portnoy's Complaint author, whose voice was heard as well through his alter-ego Nathan Zuckerman, announced his retirement during an interview last month with the French magazine Les Inrocks.

Houghton Mifflin confirmed the decision according to The Forward.

Philip Roth

in nine of his 25 novels.

Roth, who has not written a new book in three years, told Les Inrocks that he wants nothing more to do with reading fiction, writing or talking about books.

"I have dedicated my life to the novel: I studied, I taught, I wrote, I read – to the exclusion of almost everything else. Enough is enough!" he said. "I no longer feel this fanaticism to write that I have experienced all my life. The idea of trying to write again is impossible."

Roth said about five years ago that he reread classic novels by Ernest Hemingway, Ivan Turgenev, Fyodor Dostoyevsky and others, and then reread his own novels in reverse order.

Though he did not want a biography to be written about him, Roth has co-operated with biographer Blake Bailey, saying that since he knows there will be biographies written about him he wants to make sure one of them is correct.

Roth reportedly said that he has requested that his personal papers be destroyed after his death and his biography is completed.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS

POLICEMAN (HA'SHOTER)

This explosive film was acclaimed by Film Comment and The Village Voice as one of the best films of 2011. Yaron (Yiftach Klein) is part of an elite Israeli anti-terrorism unit that is pitted against a group of young anarchists. Tackling Israeli machismo, as well as the country's growing economic inequalities, Policeman has gained much international attention and controversy for its subject matter and characterizations, as well as its bold cinematic approach. "An experiment in tone that posits a new direction for Israeli cinema, Policeman is bathed in cool emotional detachment deliberately juxtaposed against its operatic story." Fortress Israel preaches a tiresome sermon

Matti Friedman
The Times of Israel

In discussions of the Israel-Arab conflict, it has become increasingly acceptable to pretend that only one character truly exists: Israel, a country peopled with Jews struggling with their history and their demons as they act out a great moral drama against a backdrop of deserts, camels and Arabs.

Israel's neighbours are present in this narrative as inanimate objects or as children. Their actions barely warrant analysis, so understanding the story does not involve looking at the complex interactions of Israel and its surroundings, but rather dissecting Israel's flaws.

A variant of this one-man show exists on Israel's right: in this narrative, the Arabs are uniformly and unalterably malevolent, and the story is Israel's failure to shed its Diaspora weakness and respond with enough force and ethnic pride.

In the version accepted on Israel's left, on the other hand, the Arabs are passive bystanders and victims, and the story is the Jews' abuse of force, their repetition of the crimes once perpetrated against them.

This take eschews political and historical complications in favour of moralizing, and tends to believe Israel is not rationally responding to external threats but surrendering to internal weaknesses. The reason there is no peace, this thinking goes, is because something is rotten in Israel's soul.

The newest addition to this expanding genre is Fortress Israel: The Inside Story of the Military Elite Who Run the Country — and Why They Can't Make Peace, by Patrick Tyler (Farrar, Straus & Giroux) formerly a senior writer at the New York Times. Tyler makes a case for a rethinking of Israeli history in which Israel is not Athens but Sparta, a belligerent and deeply militaristic society that fights not because it has to, but because it wants to.

Presented with a choice between diplomacy and force, in this telling, Israel has consistently chosen force not because circumstances demanded it, but because of a desire for battle in the state's DNA. From its inception, Tyler writes, Israel has been controlled by a "sabra military elite," a fighting class that wants war for its own reasons and has imposed its will on more dovish leaders and infected the rest of the country with the "sabra exuberance for combat."

"The broad conclusion that I believe any realistic researcher reaches," Tyler writes, "is that Israel, six decades after its founding, remains a nation in thrall to an original martial impulse, the depth of which has given rise to succeeding generations of leaders who are stunted in their capacity to wield or sustain diplomacy as a rival to military strategy, who seem ever on the hair trigger in dealing with their regional rivals, and whose contingency planners embrace worse-case scenarios that often exaggerate complex or ambiguous developments as threats to national existence.

"They do so," he continues, "reflexively and instinctively, in order to perpetuate a system of governance where national policy is dominated by the military."

As has been amply described by historians, in its early years and thereafter, Israel missed opportunities to pursue peaceful solutions, used force injudiciously, and occasionally lied about it, like most countries. There may be a good book to be written for an international audience on the way 64 years of conflict have affected Israel's national outlook and character. The military unquestionably plays an outsized role in decision-making and in the life of the country, and the effects of that imbalance in government and on individual Israelis are real and worth exploring.

This is not that book. Fortress Israel, while clearly based on copious research, is a tiresome sermon — a mix of simplistic analysis, ill-informed observation and casual slander.

Tyler is an accomplished journalist who has been posted to the Mideast, but according to his publisher, he does not know Hebrew and has never been based in Israel. (He made five trips here to report for this book.) He has nonetheless attempted an ambitious and critical political biography of the country, its leaders and society.

Some of those who have reported this conflict for many years have found their capacity for glib condemnation of either side crippled by familiarity with the subject matter. Tyler has no such constraints, and that allows him to write sentences like this one, explaining how the military pervades all levels of Israeli society: "Once in the military system, Israelis never fully exit," he explains. "They carry the military identity for life, not just through service in the reserves until age forty-nine, or through social and retirement services, but through lifelong expectations of loyalty and secrecy."

I actually had to read that sentence again to make sure I hadn't read it wrong. Anyone who thinks Israeli society is characterized by "loyalty and secrecy" has never spent time with Israelis. Anyone who has done so might find this description as unintentionally hilarious as I did.

Israel is, in many ways, a distinctly non-martial society. There are no military parades. The army is regularly pilloried in the press, and militarism is suspect. Tyler seems to believe that the Israeli military produces militaristic people, but in my experience, it mainly produces cynics.

Fortress Israel exists in the broader context of today's discussion of "Israel" — an imaginary place quite unlike the actual State of Israel — in which western observers use the country and its conflicts as a blank screen onto which they project discomfort about certain aspects of their own societies. These days, the issues that animate liberals in the West tend to be linked to colonialism, racism, and militarism, and thus it is in these contexts that the Jewish state now appears.

This book will doubtless be embraced by the kind of people actually willing to believe that Israelis see war as a strategic goal. For the rest of us, however, Fortress Israel is a disturbing sign of what is becoming accepted thinking about this country, and a demonstration of the way the past is too often at the mercy of those looking to score ideological points in the present.

Matti Friedman is the author of The Aleppo Codex: A True Story of Obsession, Faith and the Pursuit of an Ancient Bible (Algonquin Books, 2012). He has reported on Israel since 1997.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Segal's name missing from Grey Cup trophy

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Sometime this week, 87-year-old Moe Segal will climb into his car and drive 280 miles from his home in Ottawa to visit his children in Toronto. On Sunday, if family tradition is any guide, they'll gather in front of a big screen TV and turn on the Grey Cup game.

Watching the Grey Cup is a national tradition, but for Segal there's a special, personal aspect to the event. In his younger days, Segal played on a Grey Cup winning team, although he didn't know it at the time.

What's more, his name is missing from the roster of the 1944 Montreal St. Hyacinthe Donnacona "Combines," engraved on the storied Cup; and you won't see his image on the team's championship photo.

Here's the story as Segal tells it: Back in the 1940s, he was a very good player, a championship-winner in high school and junior football.

But it was wartime, and Segal along with his buddies enlisted in the navy. While training in St. Hyacinthe as a signalman – he'd be posted on board a minesweeper – he noticed a flyer posted on a bulletin board asking young seamen to try out for the navy's football team.

That was something right up his alley and though all of five-foot-eight and 185 pounds, he made it as "inside wing," what today would be called guard. Since players lined up both ways, Segal played in the middle of the line on defence as well.

Moe Segal with the Grey Cup

The navy team was stacked with former Toronto Argonaut players and they did pretty well playing in the Quebec Rugby Football Union. It was the era before the creation of the Canadian Football League and because of the war, the Grey Cup game departed from its traditional east/west format to feature a title game between the Quebec and Ontario champions.

The navy team, nicknamed "Middies" and "Donnies," played so well they earned a spot in the championship game versus the reigning Grey Cup champion Hamilton Wildcats; but a week before that game, Segal was injured in an exhibition contest.

"My hand shouldn't have been on the ground and he [Annis Stukus] stepped on it by accident," he said. It swelled up so bad he had to have his navy ring cut off "so it wouldn't explode."

As a result, he was given a week's medical leave and he went home to Ottawa, missing the big game. The Middies defeated the Wildcats 7-6; championship photos were taken but a few weeks later the team learned it was the Grey Cup they had won, not some generic championship game, Segal said.

The Navy team had their names engraved on the Cup, but Segal's was omitted because he didn't suit up for the game itself.

He says it doesn't bother him much, but in an interview from his home in Ottawa, he points out that the Cup features the names of owners who never got on the field either; and he's upset that the caption for team photograph, taken on Grey Cup game day, doesn't mention him as an absent member of the team.

"I would've stayed if I'd known they were going to take a picture," he said.

But there's another picture, connected to the Grey Cup that Segal points to with pride. It's in the Football Hall of Fame and it shows Segal pointing to a name engraved four times on the Grey Cup, that of his nephew Noah Cantor. Cantor won three championships with Toronto and one with the BC Lions.

Like his uncle, Cantor played in the interior of the defensive line, though he tipped the scales at six-foot-three and 265 pounds.

Segal said that he fared pretty well as a lineman during the war years and afterwards, when he accepted a contract to play with the hometown Ottawa Rough Riders.

They played a 10-game season back then and things were going along pretty well until Oct. 5, 1946. Game day happened to coincide with Yom Kippur. Segal declined to play, as did another Jewish player, Benny Stek of the Alouettes.

"It cost me $100; [the coach] benched me for two games," Segal recalled. The fine represented 20 per cent of his football income, which he supplemented by running a small confectionary store. The next season, Segal signed with the cross-town rivals, the Ottawa Trojans of the Ontario Rugby Football Union (ORFU).

Though only in his early 20s, it was near the end of his football career. Around that time, teams started bringing in American imports, including linemen who weighed around 250-pounds.

At 185 it was hard to compete, but what really cinched it for him was suffering two concussions. The first time, he was playing for Navy; apparently – he doesn't recall the incident at all – he blocked a punt and the next thing he knew he woke up in a neurological institute. After his second concussion, suffered while playing for the Trojans, "I said, enough is enough. I packed it in and never looked back."

He pretty much gave up sports – he'd been active in baseball and hockey in addition to football – married his wife of 46 years, Sandy, and he tried his hands at a number of occupations. Among them was running a clothing store, The Squire Shop, and closed out his working career at age 85 working in commercial real estate as an agent.

He follows football intermittently now, but he doesn't miss a reunion with his old Navy buddies.

He marvels at the size of players today and the equipment they wear. Back in his day, he had a solid leather helmet and canvas pants that were stuffed with padding for protection.

The equipment today is much advanced and as for the players, "the size today, they buy them by the pound," he quipped.

Not much room anymore for a 185-pound lineman.

Montreal band Stars embarks on arena tour

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

he music and lyrics on Montreal band Stars' latest album, The North, is inspired by their childhood growing up in Canada, says Chris Seligman, keyboardist and founding member of the band.

"The nature aspect of the north, the architecture of the '80s, and the landscapes slowly induced into this visual and also this feeling of actually growing up in the north," says the Toronto-born musician.

The album looks toward the future at how the land in Canada is treated, and how that will affect the landscape, he adds. "It's a little scary to think things will change, but it's looking like 200 to 300 years from now, the north will look very different."

In a sense, the album sends a political message, looking at how the country has become so politically conservative, he says.

"We're just living in the present and trying to take what we need now as opposed to looking into the future and seeing what we'll need, and stepping back and doing things now for the future," he says. "This idea of being kind and treating humans and nature with kindness is what we'd like to see happen."

He says he sometimes feels powerless against the politicians who make policies that ignore the future, yet a song can change the way people think and shape their lives so they're not completely powerless.

"In a dream world, I could get back at you through a song," he says. That's the idea behind one new track, A Song Is a Weapon, which he calls a parting shot to Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Many of the new songs sport a clear '80s influence, which Seligman says has always been a part of the songs, though that has not always been a conscious decision.

"I feel like the more we [write], the more it kind of happens organically. It's less about thought and more about just what's coming out of your soul," he says.

The division of work hasn't changed since the band's first release 13 years ago. It all started when Seligman moved into childhood friend and Stars' vocalist Torquill Campbell's apartment in New York City, where he would write music while Campbell was out performing.

"He would leave and I would sit there and play around with stuff for hours," Seligman says. "He would come in and write on top of that."

The band still uses that writing process on the newest album, though the group also consists of three more musicians: vocalist Amy Millan, guitarist Evan Cranley and drummer Pat McGee.

Generally, they would piece their songs together over several months, Seligman says. But this time, they decided to create just a skeleton for a song before they went into the studio to record it. Throughout one day, they would record it over and over, writing the song as they went.

"We felt like capturing that energy would be a new musical moment for us," he says. The meat of the song would be completed by the end of the day, though they might retouch some parts or add more elements to the music.

Seligman says it was the most fun he's had making an album.

"Maybe it's just maturing a bit more and not worrying about things as much," he says, adding that he's been trying to apply that to all aspects of his life.

Seligman recently celebrated his 40th birthday while on tour in the United States.

"I was a little bit worried going into it just because I was turning 40 and I was having a midlife crisis — I probably still am," he says.

But getting older has helped him become more at ease and less hard on himself, he says.

"I had a blast on my birthday. I was with my family. Stars are my best friends," he says.

This tour, they're joined by a new member of the Stars family: singer Millan and guitarist Cranley's toddler, Delphine. Seligman says it's amazing to be around the child, who was born March of last year, watching her learn to walk and talk. "You see her slowly growing up and turning into a little human," he says.

The baby was born while the band was making the new album.

"It was obviously a very amazing thing to happen to one's life," he says, adding that it affected everyone in the band. One of the new songs, Lights Changing Colour, which he calls the most personal track, was written as a message to an older Delphine.

"The song is kind of about the process of having a child and also imagining her growing up and looking at it 15 years down the road," he says.

After five weeks of touring in the United States, they've returned to Canada for a cross-country arena tour with Grammy-nominated Toronto indie band Metric. Stars has worked with Metric in the past — for example, a couple of songs on their early albums feature Metric frontwoman Emily Haines.

"They're my best friends, and we're [having] the time of our lives," Seligman says, adding that this is Stars' first arena tour. "We might not get to do this ever again. Let's just enjoy the moment and go on tour with some of our closest friends and see what happens."

He says performing in an arena is an interesting learning experience. You have to expect that it's not going to sound the same as it does in a small club.

"You're kind of overwhelmed by the largeness of it, the epicness of it, and you have to fill the room with your energy," he says, adding that it's a fantastic learning experience. "We'll come away from this having learned a lot and become better performers."

Horrors of Halloween

I'm heaving a sigh of relief that Halloween is behind us for another year. Confession: I hate it with a passion. I like my holidays to have some meaning, and with its focus on candy, door-knocking and ghoulish displays outside many of the homes in my neighbourhood, the meaning of Halloween, if there is any, remains an enigma to me.

My kids have learned to tolerate their mom's antipathy towards a holiday they adore. They know there will be no fake gravestones on our lawn, no cobwebs strung outside the garage and no mechanical spiders dangling from the roof. Since my husband insists on it, we're among those three-quarters of Canadians who spend money stocking up on candy, contributing to the mind-boggling $331 million this country spends on sweet junk each year in October. But when they choose to dress up, my kids are on their own to improvise an outfit from their trusty dress-up drawer. Shopping trips are out of the question.

As a Jewish mother, I'm inclined to forbid their participation in Halloween completely. Religiously, it feels like spiritual anathema, a mockery of death and the afterlife. Besides, what can it offer, I wonder, aside from unwanted cavities?

But something has stopped me from cutting Halloween out of their lives. The parent in me is softened by my kids' ardent desire to join their neighbourhood friends, to feel part of the excitement generated by school Halloween parties, advertisements and in-store marketing collateral. There's also the small issue of stockpiling candy, a double-edged sword for a mother with a penchant for Kit Kat chocolate bars, of which there's a verdant supply in those candy bags, year after year.

I don't keep quiet about my disdain for Halloween, and each year I invite my kids to question exactly why they want to participate and what they plan to do with their loot. We discuss what havoc that candy will unleash on their teeth, how little nourishment it offers their growing bodies and how many homeowners consider the persistent knocks on the door to be an annoyance exceeded only by ungrateful kids who don't even murmur a thank you after you've contributed to their stash.

This year, my cavity preaching must have paid off. My children arrived home, dumped their candy on the floor and immediately started bargaining to exchange it with their father for a few dollars. Sure, I'm still finding wrappers in unsuspecting corners of the house, but the vast majority of our candy stockpile is thankfully gone, until next year at the very least.

I'm off the hook for another 11 months, at which point the meaningless horror of Halloween will confront me, once again. Look for me in the shadows. I'll be the reluctant parent huddled in a coat a few feet from my kids as they knock on the door clasp bulging bags of candy. I'll be the one reminding them to say thank you, trying to usher them home and attempting to rid those candy bags of the worst cavity culprits. If there's a Grinch of Halloween, it's me. Toss it firmly off the calendar, I say. I wouldn't miss it for a second.

Married With Kids

The Laminate Man

A man came by my home to lay laminate down. We sat and talked.

He told me he has been married for 47 years, and he and his wife have two girls, 31 and 38, both of whom still live at home. The Laminate Man, 72, had that aura of a person who sits in a coffee shop all day long and banters on about the Leafs and Harper's crazy refugee laws.

But after a while of shmoozing I could see there was a lot going on inside this man's soul. The Laminate Man was a very intelligent man, quite able to articulate ideas in a most cogent fashion. Before he spoke, he considered his thoughts carefully. He was an old school sort of fellow, self-denigrating and the like, somewhat tired, but along with that came a firm understanding of life and a powerful drive to succeed.

When the laminate installer was a kid,

While we talked, I watched the Laminate Man. In my imagination, the Laminate Man was wearing a three-piece suit, sitting steadfastly at my dining room table speaking to me the way very wealthy people do – with that royal assurance one only gets from brokering the big deal.

I looked closely at him and projected another life on to him. I pretended he had finished his education and launched a company, one with a large staff with back office people and a sales force. I saw him as a corporate mogul, a multimillionaire who was invited to expensive functions and honoured for his philanthropy and tikun olam.

As I looked, I wondered about the paths we take in life and why we do. The Laminate Man's name is not on the cornerstone of a hospital in downtown Toronto, and he is not called to comment on issues having to do with State of Israel. His road was different. It changed on a dime, because the Laminate Man's father died early on; because he was forced to leave school and become a tiny breadwinner. He should have been playing ball.

What would his life have been had his father lived?

We work hard, find a groove at some point and strive to bring meaning to our family, our community, the world and sometimes even ourselves. But all of this is predicated on the path we took, not the one we didn't. What would our lives be if they had taken one fundamentally different turn; if life-changing news arrived uninvited one morning?

Vincent van Gogh said he celebrated all the pictures he created and mourned those he was never able to. That is the Laminate Man.

Teen creates tribute videos for your events

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Sammy Barsky may be young, but that hasn't stopped him from starting his own business.

When the 13-year-old saw Apple's Final Cut Pro video-editing software, he knew he wanted it. However, with the program's $300 price tag, he needed a way to earn the money.

That's why he started a company to create the tribute videos shown at bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings and other life-cycle events. It's fitting, he says, that he'd work to create videos in order to save for professional video-editing software.

His very first client came through his father's connections, and Barsky created a fun tribute video for a bat mitzvah featuring photos all the way from the girl's birth to just before the bat mitzvah.

"People thought it was great," Barsky says. "It took me about two or three days to do, and then I went over to their house and showed it to them."

He wanted to keep in close contact with the clients during the videos production to ensure they were happy with the final product. He welcomed their suggestions on background songs, as well as their requests about how to use some of the photos in the video.

"They send me the photos because I'm not there for their entire life," he jokes. Clients can also include short video segments, if they want. "I put it into the video for them."

He highlights clients' favourite memories through the videos, which are shared with guests – usually over laughter and tears – at the events themselves. "I can do captions or text highlighting little facts in the video and make the photos look really good," he says.

The seeds for his video-production passion were planted in 2007, when his father bought an iMac computer. Barsky found it difficult to use at first, quickly caught on.

"Since then, I've learned a lot about computers. Now it's really easy for me to use the programs," he says. "I can do really good transitions. I know how to make the photos have different colour grading, colour correction, different effects, and [also add] music to it."

Barsky celebrated his own bar mitzvah this past summer, and yes, he did have a tribute video celebrating his own life – but he decided not to make it himself.

Aspiring graphic designer lives his dream and helps others celebrate

"My dad thought it would be more special if he made it," he says. "He wanted it to be a surprise."

However, his father is encouraging him to work on a "Sammy Barsky tribute video" of his own.

Barsky has also become skilled in website creation, building his own website this past summer to advertise his business. He decided deciding to call it Shlomography, combining his Hebrew name, Shlomo, with "photography."

"My uncle thought of it as a joke, and I figured, it was really catchy, people won't forget that," he says.

The website, at shlomography.ca, includes samples of his photo-correction work, as well as prices and other information about his tribute videos.

One day, Barsky says, he hopes to expand his business to include photographing the actual events. His dream, however, is to eventually work in graphic design, making websites and designing posters for companies.

To reach his dream, he'll continue to spend time building his portfolio of tribute videos. "I prioritize schoolwork first and then I do the videos," he said.

At the moment, he's actively looking for clients. "I'm trying my best," he said, adding that he has advertised in The CJN, and through word-of-mouth. "And I'm trying my hardest to find someone who needs a video."

To contact Barsky, and to find out more about his company, call 647-961-7266, or visit shlomography.ca.

Officiants add beauty, meaning to ceremony

Hiddur mitzvah among the benefits of freelance clergy

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Cantor Deborah Staiman and Rabbi Eva Goldfinger are more than just wedding officiants – they bring an enhanced sense of beauty and spirituality to any life-cycle event.

Staiman, (416-483-9532, jewishlifecycles.ca), a Toronto native, says that hiddur mitzvah – “beautification of a mitzvah” – is of prime importance when celebrating these events. That “means going beyond the minimum requirement,” she says. “It glorifies the performance further, and brings beauty to our world.”

A graduate of Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion and a member of the American Conference of Cantors and the Toronto Council of Chazanim, Staiman officiates at a variety of life-cycle events including weddings, baby namings and renewals of vows.

Hiddur mitzvah, she says, is a form of expression that engages the senses, thereby enhancing the aesthetics of Jewish life.

“It adds a different quality, attention, and level of holiness to one’s actions. In practical terms, it is a giving of ourselves. It opens our hearts in any number of ways, whether it be art, dance, movement, music, food or words, and allows us to make unique, meaningful... contributions that connect us to God, however we understand God.”

Traditionally, she said, Jewish prayers are chanted. “My role as a cantor is to help people connect to the service, and relate to the sanctity of the moment by singing from my heart.”

When it comes to weddings, says Staiman, brides put a lot of thought into their dress, and couples discuss the band they are going to hire, the food and table settings. “The... ceremony, though, is the soul of the wedding day. It is not very long compared to the rest of the event, but it includes some powerful, intimate, intense moments.

“I can help couples make their ceremony more beautiful and personal, through songs or readings.”

She said she meets with the bride and groom before the wedding to discuss the meaning behind the ceremony. “We can design the ceremony together, textually and musically.”

Rabbi Eva Goldfinger (416-494-7450) spiritual leader of Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism, provides a variety of services, including Jewish and intercultural weddings, baby-namings, brit tikun for girls and boys, bar/bat mitzvahs for youth and adults, and other life-cycle events.

She says that “in creating our custom ceremonies, we adopt or adapt existing rituals so they are consistent with our secular humanistic philosophy, which is that we have the power and responsibility to make our lives and the world a better place.”

All ceremonies are egalitarian, she says, and do not include theistic language or worship. “They are respectful and inclusive, and serve the needs of Jewish and intercultural/interfaith couples and families, as well as the lesbian and gay communities.”

Rabbi Goldfinger says that as a humanistic rabbi, she helps create beautiful wedding ceremonies in which the couple and their loving relationship are the focus.

“We honour the dignity and individuality of each partner, and talk about their friendship, love and commitment to each other, as well as the behaviours necessary to create a lasting and fulfilling marriage.”

Jewish and other cultural traditions may be included, she said, and are explained in ways that have meaning for the couple and their families.

She said that there are a number of people in the Jewish community who marry non-Jews but want to remain connected. “It is helpful for them to speak to someone who accepts their choice. I see my role as a counsellor who supports and encourages couples, and welcomes them into the Jewish community.”

What women want... in a dress

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

"I need a dress. I need it now, and I don't know where to start" is a line Claire Salisbury of By Tocca (905-338-7500) hears often.

By Tocca, an upscale women's fashion store in Oakville, provides a full-service shopping experience to take the worries off your shoulders. "Every woman deserves to feel beautiful for that special occasion," says Salisbury.

She's shared some tips to help make the purchase as smooth and rewarding as possible.

When shopping for a dress, help sales staff get a real sense of your own style and personality, and of the event itself. Telling them you're dressing for a wedding isn't enough, says Salisbury. "That wedding could be black tie, casual, garden, a destination wedding." Giving them all the information, including the tone or theme of the event, lets sales staff help you narrow down your selections.

Customers often look longingly at dresses they think they can't wear because of religious restrictions, as when an event is being held in a synagogue. But, Salisbury says, don't be so quick to assume that dress you fell in love with is off the table. "If the dress of their dreams... [is] perhaps a little low in the front, or in the back, but they... still want to be appropriate," alterations may help. By Tocca's seamstress is "expert at building up the back or front of clothing in order for it to work for that particular client."

Think about how you feel about colour: sometimes, classic black is a must, but at other times, for example, for an outdoor summer wedding, there are better choices. While black is still the overwhelming favourite for a cocktail or gala event, Salisbury says you shouldn't be afraid to try colours such as "blues, cobalt blues, silvers, greys, some red, a little bit of green..." Purple has been a very strong colour this year as well.

You don't have to shop alone, either, though many prefer to.

"We're a destination shop – we don't get a lot of people coming in to make impulse purchases." Customers often come in more than once, sometimes with a husband or friend in tow to help make the final decision. "That's part of our service... we encourage them to make the right choice so they feel beautiful, feel confident."

With friends or family, a private appointment will ensure that you get undivided attention. Salisbury says By Tocca is a beautiful spot for an outing, at 315 Lakeshore Rd. E., near downtown Oakville, and five minutes from the QEW – they'll even recommend delicious lunch options nearby.

Better yet, make it an after-hours get-together: "We're happy to do private shopping appointments or parties after hours for ladies with a group of friends who want to come shop for a particular event or a particular season... we'll close the store, usually do a little wine and cheese. It's a nice shopping experience for them."

Perhaps every woman's nightmare is walking into an event and seeing her dress on another guest. Salisbury says By Tocca carries only one or two of each style. "It's not like going to another shop where they have like 20 size 2s."

Staff also keep careful records of which clients buy which dresses for a particular event, such as for the recent Oakville Hospital Gala, which saw many clients coming through. "We won't allow a client to buy the same dress to go to the same event."

But do make sure you have access to a great selection. A particular label might not suit you, so it's best to have a variety of brand options. "We carry Wayne Clark, Frascara, badgley mischka, alberto makali, Twenty Cluny, Greta Constantine, Teri Jon, Terani, Tadashi Shoji, Ypsy from Paris, Daymor Couture, Aidan Mattox, Monique L'hullier, Theia and more," says Salisbury.

Beyond dresses, you'll need accessories and other items. One-stop shopping saves time and ensures that your ensemble connects beautifully. "We're full service – shoes, bags, jewelry, furs, wraps, undergarments. We are really a full-service gown and special occasion shop."

Ultimately, Salisbury says, every woman wants a dress that helps "her body to look really wonderful." If you're tugging or pulling to get it to hang properly, you won't be looking or feeling your best – and you can't relax and enjoy the event. "We don't want the dress to wear the customer. We are very careful when we help the client select the dress," ensuring that it's right for the event and for her.

"Often that means the client comes back for two fittings," she says, but the perfect fit is worth it.

She adds, "We're happy to send a dress to the client after the fitting or bring it to them," so a return visit may not be necessary.

"We want the customer to be beautiful and stunning, not because of the dress, the dress just complements them. I think that's what most women want."

Enjoy your Jewish destination wedding

Mindless Sophistication can plan events in exotic locales

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Once upon a time, you had to choose between having a destination wedding or a Jewish wedding.

Today, thanks to Sandra Aaron, you can have both. "I am able to merge those concepts. It's like making a couple's dream come true."

Sandra Aaron began her company, Mindless Sophistication, in 2006, after spending years as an event planner. Aaron can help clients plan any type of event, from small birthday parties to sweet sixteen to large weddings.

"I try to make every occasion a true celebration — one full of memorable moments," she said.

Aaron offers a variety of wedding packages, ranging from just recommending vendors to a full package that includes assistance with all planning details and facilitating the actual event.

"Everyone has different needs in a wedding planner. Some couples only have a few questions, but others want their hands held the whole time. I can customize my services to meet their needs," Aaron said.

Though Mindless Sophistication is based in Toronto, Aaron can plan traditional Jewish weddings anywhere in the world.

"One of my favourite wedding spots is St. Thomas in the Virgin Islands. They have the most stunning, historical synagogue with a sand floor."

Aaron offers two choices when planning a destination wedding. The first is to have her train an event planner who lives where the wedding is taking place. "Resorts and other venues often have their own wedding consultants, but they likely to do not know how to incorporate the Jewish components," said Aaron. For instance, she said, "my training usually involves teaching them how to build a chupah."

The other option is to take Aaron along to your destination. "This is certainly an amazing perk of my job," said Aaron. There, she can take care of all the details of your event, allowing you to relax and enjoy your travels. She will also help plan wedding-related events, such as brunches or group excursions. "When people travel to a wedding, it's more than just a one-day event. I make sure their whole experience is as special as the wedding itself."

Aaron can find local synagogues and rabbis, or rabbis willing to travel to the wedding location.

"I also have an amazing ability to find kosher food in the most obscure places. If we are somewhere especially remote, I can always count on Chabad to be there to help me out," she said. "It's really special that we are able to maintain Jewish traditions in cities that may not have any Jewish residents."

Aaron will work with a travel agency to help guests make arrangements. She can also help guests at the destination with local theatre tickets, transportation, tours and dinner reservations.

"Everyone wants to make their guests feel extra special, and this way you don't need to worry about the details."

It's time to suit up.

When a big simchah looms and it's time to get a new suit, Tom Mihalik of Tom's Place knows not just any suit will do.

Owner of Tom's Place for three decades, Mihalik has seen what a new suit can do for a customer.

"It changes their whole persona and it can change their whole life," Mihalik said. "A well-fitting suit will give a gentleman an advantage over the others."

Mazel Tov on your special occasion

That holds true even more in these days of casual and dressed-down corporate environments.

"A suit and clothing is very important, especially in today's world," he said. "You want to stand out when you go for a job interview or have a function to attend."

Personally, Mihalik said, he's passionate about fashionable wear. "I'm a clotheshorse... I love clothing. I love suits. I like shirts, and I like ties."

A well-fitting suit can change your life, clothier says

"So for me, I'm living in my dream world."

Mihalik comes by his interest in fashion honestly, having bought the store from his father, William, who came to Canada in 1956 after escaping from Hungary.

"When he moved to Toronto, there were a lot of Hungarians he knew who were in business, opening up stores," said Mihalik. "They came to my dad and said 'Willie, why don't you open up a second-hand clothing store?'"

"He opened up a used clothing store on Kensington Ave., and that's how Tom's Place was started," Mihalik began working for his father in 1968.

Originally known as Willie's Bargain Store, Tom's Place has become a cornerstone of its the Kensington Market neighbourhood, where Mihalik himself is a well-known character.

"I spent my whole life around Spadina, Dundas and College," Mihalik said. "I'm a great believer in downtown."

Despite only having a single store, he manages to warehouse a surprising selection of formal wear to rival any larger competitor.

"We always have anywhere from 8,000-12,000 suits in stock," Mihalik said. Of course, quantity isn't everything, he added. "Nobody carries this kind of quality. The reason why we do that is because we believe in ourselves."

"We know what when you need a helping hand, you come and see Tom, and he'll hook you up with the best-fitting suits for the best possible price."

Tom's Place carries suits ranging from $200 to $1,400. Some of the higher-end suits come from Italy. "A lot of people forget that not only do we sell great-quality suits at a great price, but we also have luxury suits," Mihalik said. "We bring in luxury woollens and have [suits] manufactured in Montreal."

But there's more to Tom's Place than just suits. "We have a great selection of sport jackets, shirts, ties and trousers," Mihalik said. "Our overcoat [trench coat] selection is second to none."

It can be overwhelming to try to find the right suit among thousands, let alone put the whole look together. That's why Tom's Place staff can offer expert advice.

"We have very capable, highly trained staff," Mihalik said. "They've been working with us for many years and they've been working in some of the finest clothing stores in the world."

Anyone on hand, including Mihalik himself, will be glad to help make sure that you'll look your best for whatever special occasion is coming up.

"I always like to see a well-fitting suit on a person," Mihalik said.

Tom's Place is located at 190 Baldwin St. in Kensington Market. Reach the store by phone at 416-596-0297 or find Tom's Place online at toms-place.com.

THE CANADIAN JEWISH NEWS

IT'S...SHOWTIME (literally)

SHOWTIME: A Special Events and Party Expo

In its fifth iteration, Showtime has become the show that all sides of the event world anticipate enthusiastically. Whether you're a novice host or a seasoned party planner – there is something at Showtime for you. Those seeking information to organize an upcoming event like a Bar or Bat Mitzvah are guaranteed to find everything they need in one convenient location. There is no entrance fee.

One of the show's organizers, Jian Magen of Magen Boys Entertainment, puts it this way: "We started Showtime for our clients. In one night, you can meet the industry's top trades and professionals in an approachable environment. Showtime is a party and a resource center at the same time! All of our vendors have been carefully approached, almost like an exclusive list of the top people you can hire for a party. MBE and SP are notorious for putting on top notch events and SHOWTIME is the brainchild of our hard work."

The Magen Boys teamed up with Solepower Productions and Gloria Benaim to put on the fifth Showtime on October 11th. Gloria Benaim is an Event Planner and Corporate Event Director for Magen Boys who are longtime friends of Solepower's Abby Tobias. The group simply felt that there weren't any great combination mitzvah wedding shows. All the shows they had been to and participated in felt the same – dull. So they decided to create a show that is fun and appealing to everyone. Not just for the clients coming to the show, but for the vendors too.

That fun feeling was very much in evidence among the 81 vendors, Page Magen says. "These vendors are hand-picked and the best in the business. Being able to work with the top people in the industry makes our show so worthwhile! They are cutting edge, and always thinking out of the box. That's why we love them."

Ever wonder why people ended up working in the events industry? It's because they like to party and that quality was evident among the many exhibitors. For party pros, the atmosphere is akin to a friendly reunion. Seasoned professionals meet new kids on the block and it's all about the latest trends.

Gloria Benaim identified trends at the show: "There was lots of personal branding with logos on chocolate, photographs and even on dance floors. Also big are deconstructed or do-it-yourself food stations, such as sushi in a cup, popcorn chicken, taco fillings and pasta toppings." Attendees sampled and sipped as they perused the booths getting expert advice. This is no Mickey Mouse affair. Top-notch names in the industry fill the aisles. From ice sculpture to icy gelato – it's all on display and available at Showtime.

Abby Tobias sums it up: "We are proud to be heading into our sixth SHOWTIME events expo. Our team has worked extremely hard to produce a trade show that caters to the needs of our client base, while offering new trends for the upcoming season. We already have some great new ideas and services to showcase! See you at the Warehouse on March 6th!"

Watches become timeless status symbol

Van Rijk Jewellers caters to the educated collector

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

In an age when most people pull out their cellphones to find out the time, well-made watches are becoming more than just jewelry for men – they're finding a niche as the sign of a savvy connoisseur.

"This is the world of the educated watch collector," says Alec Van Rijk of Van Rijk Jewellers. "Watches have become a status symbol for a man's success and, since men tend not to wear a lot of jewelry, they love watches and often have three or four of them."

Alec Van Rijk, a certified gemologist with a store at 90 Eglinton Ave. E., has been immersed in the pre-owned jewelry and watch business, serving the Greater Toronto Area for 30 years.

"We specialize in buying, selling and trading modern, vintage and designer jewelry and watches," he says.

That includes pieces from top designers and brands, including Cartier, Chopard, Bulgari and Tiffany, as well as items that date back to the 1800s.

"Our prodigious watch collection consists of fine brands, including Rolex, Patek Philippe, Omega and Breitling as well as a series of limited edition and collectible models," he adds. "Whether you're looking for a chronograph, tourbillon, or high-end watch, we can help you find it."

You don't have to worry about finding a good deal on pre-owned watches or jewelry when you're buying from an established jeweller like Van Rijk. "We have a solid reputation for excellent value, quality merchandise, and exceptional customer service."

Naturally, Van Rijk buys jewelry and watches as well, though an appointment is required. Three options are available when selling to Van Rijk: a cash buyout value, a cash-plus-trade value and a full trade toward something else in the store.

The workmanship in vintage jewelry is impossible to find in today's market

"The advantages of trading are that you get more and you don't pay the 13 per cent tax on the amount of your trade," Van Rijk says.

One client came into the store with a well-worn, vintage Rolex steel watch, along with the original box, papers and receipt for the watch. "He'd inherited it from his father and hoped to get a couple hundred dollars for it," Van Rijk immediately identified the watch as a Rolex Paul Newman Daytona, the kind worn by Paul Newman in the movie Le Mans, and highly prized by collectors. Van Rijk Jewellers offered him $45,000 and the customer was thrilled to walk out with such a large cheque.

Van Rijk explains that the workmanship in vintage pieces of jewelry and watches is impossible to find in today's market, which makes these pieces appealing to customers looking for something unique.

"Our company has grown into a vibrant and successful business since its founding in 1985," he says.

Experienced in-house jewellers can create custom pieces for clients or remodel existing jewelry. For bat mitzvah gifts, Van Rijk suggests signed Tiffany & Co. jewelry, while for anniversaries, an eternity band is an ideal gift.

A beautiful piece of jewelry is a timeless, personal and meaningful gift, says Van Rijk. And it won't bankrupt you: exquisite pieces start at $99, including many pre-loved items still in impeccable condition.

Gallery features contemporary Jewish art

Art & Soul's collection is 'bold – a breath of fresh air'

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

In 2004, Deborah and Richie Cohen visited Israel during the second intifadah and were stunned to see many art galleries in and around Safed closed, their artists struggling to make a living.

"They complained about the lack of tourism and the difficult economic situation in the city and its surroundings," recalls Deborah.

"Tourism had dropped significantly. At that moment, I realized there was an opportunity to help Israeli artists promote their work in Toronto by taking advantage of our family connections."

The family she married into 18 years ago stimulated her love affair with art through its dedication to create and promote art both in Canada and worldwide.

After returning from Israel, Deborah opened an art gallery in her basement, advertising in the Jewish community.

By 2008, her basement days were over.

Cohen became a partner with PI Fine Art, her husband's family business joining a new, 18,000-square-foot, modern showroom in Toronto's Caledonia design district.

"a place where my artists can shine," she says.

"We have become the prime source of Jewish art in Toronto, and through our website, we are reaching out to the world while continuing to support Israel and my cherished group of incredible talented artists."

Cohen's gallery, Art & Soul, at 1180 Caledonia Rd., has introduced Toronto to a new concept of Jewish art, all of it curated by her and framed by PI Fine Art.

"Most collectors associate Jewish art with traditional images of Jewish life-cycles, but our collection is young, contemporary, bold – a breath of fresh air," she explains.

It features original paintings, limited editions, open edition prints, photography and papercuts by some of Israel's best artists, including Yoram Raanan, Ofra Friedland, Yaakov Kaszemer, Igal Fedida, Jonathan Kis-Lev, Naama Nothman, Judith Yellin, Amalia Nini, and Yitzchok Mouly.

Limited edition prints start at $96, but Art & Soul carries original artwork on canvases for up to $20,000, and everything in between.

"Acquiring a piece of art for someone is a lasting gift and a gesture that is very personal," Cohen says.

"It might be the starting point for someone to build a personal art collection or a way to communicate our connection to a specific style, era or place. Jewish art in particular is a wonderful way to transmit our Jewish values and heritage for generations to come."

Cohen and her team conduct free in-house consultations in which they bring art to clients' homes, offering suggestions for its placement and framing options.

Artwork is also available for rentals, such as special occasions, and the Art & Soul showroom can be hired out for private and corporate functions.

Check out Art & Soul's annual warehouse sale on Dec. 2.

Mazon and ECHOage help kids fight hunger

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Mazon Canada, which calls itself "the national Jewish response to hunger," has become the first Jewish charity to team up with ECHOage, a birthday party website echoage.com that lets kids choose gifts and donate to a charity of their choice.

Founded in 2008 by Debbie Zinman and Alison Smith, the site simplifies the gift-buying process for parents and involves children on a meaningful level.

Tzedakah alliance teaches kids to think of others while they're celebrating

In an interview posted on their website, Smith said "we wanted to make gift giving and receiving more rewarding for the kids and less work for the parents."

Mazon Canada executive director Ida McLaughlin said that when Zinman, a past Mazon Canada volunteer, approached Mazon to join the list of ECHOage charities, "we were thrilled to accept their offer. We have been using the website since August."

The concept is simple, she said. "Children choose the birthday gift they want and also choose a charity to support. Instead of bringing gifts to the party, guests are asked to contribute funds through a dedicated page on the ECHOage website.

"The funds are distributed evenly between the gift for the child and the charity. The website makes it more rewarding for kids and less work for parents. Guests win too, because they receive a tax receipt for all donations above $15," she said.

McLaughlin said that when a child chooses Mazon Canada through ECHOage, they support the work of feeding hungry families. "Now that is something to celebrate."

The site teaches children about tzedakah, she said, and reminds them that they should always think about others while they're celebrating.

"I am proud to be part of this. Children think beyond themselves, but they still celebrate their own birthdays."

The website goes along with Mazon's original concept. Founded in 1986, McLaughlin said, the organization promoted the "three per cent" principle, asking supporters to donate three per cent of the food costs of any simchah or milestone event to Mazon's food charities. Beginning with asking the Jewish community to symbolically invite a hungry stranger to their table, the organization later branched out to other fundraising avenues, including special events, holiday appeals and meaningful occasion cards.

Based on the principle of tikkun olam, Mazon raises awareness of the community's responsibility to "fix" poverty and hunger, linking it with tzedakah in practical ways.

Once a year, Mazon allocates funds on a non-denominational basis to agencies across Canada that fight hunger on the front lines. The allocations committee and board of directors comprise representatives from diverse professions, including rabbis, accountants, lawyers, professors and community workers.

Since 1986, Mazon has allocated about $7 million to hunger programs across the country. This spring, the agency granted close to $120,000 to a variety of organizations including, in Ontario, Beth Shalom Synagogue's Out of the Cold program, Ezrat Achim, Link Yad Chesed, National Council of Jewish Women/Canada, and the Ottawa Kosher Food Bank.

McLaughlin said she's proud to be part of a project that helps children learn about helping to feed others.

Mazon can be reached at 416-783-7554, while ECHOage can be reached via email at info@echoage.com.

Swaye Entertainment books high-end pros

Magicians, mimes, balloonists, dancers – you name it

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CIN

If you want to take your simchah to the next level then look no further than Swaye Entertainment, one of Canada's most comprehensive entertainment booking companies.

Adam Swaye, founder of Swaye Entertainment (www.swayeentertainment.com; 416-545-0741), is a professional and award-winning magician who has performed in casinos, resorts, trade shows and corporate parties for more than 20 years. Swaye represents a large variety of entertainers, including magicians, hypnotists, caricature artists, mimes and balloon artists.

"Because of the high-end events I attend, I know other high-end performers," Swaye says. "This means I am able to guarantee the absolute best entertainment. I only work with professionals – people who have had extensive training in their area. My performers are not just doing this as a hobby."

After being part of the entertainment scene for so many years, Swaye has worked with many event planners and popular party vendors.

"My entertainers will complement the rest of your event. We know all the vendors and know how to do our part without getting in the way of anyone."

Most commonly, clients will choose to hire an entertainer for the cocktail hour of an event before the dinner and dancing commences.

"When people are waiting around there is a captive audience and people, kids especially, need to be entertained."

Clients can call Swaye Entertainment to request a specific performer, or they can ask Swaye for recommendations.

"Since I go to so many events, I know which performers work with each demographic."

Swaye can also recommend performers to be part of the actual reception, such as belly dancers, dance troupes or celebrity impersonators.

"We have amazing people impersonating people like Elvis, Lady Gaga or Katy Perry," Swaye says.

A new and unique trick that will be sure to impress all partygoers is Swaye's way of introducing the bar or bat mitzvah child at their receptions. "We can make them magically appear," said Swaye. "It's part of an illusion. It is always a huge hit."

For bar and bat mitzvahs, events where there will be many children and teens, interactive entertainers are the most popular. This includes entertainers such as mentalists who include the audience in their show by reading their minds or making object disappear.

"People also love caricature artists – these are great souvenirs."

Swaye Entertainment can also provide specialty food items for later in the evening such as cotton candy.

In addition, Swaye is able to recommend an entertainer for smaller functions.

"Women love psychics. We've had some good success with these for events like bachelorette parties."

Mentalists, magicians and other performers can come to your home.

"The key thing I want to stress about my company is that it's all about high quality," Swaye says. "We amaze adults as much as we amaze kids. You never have to worry about being embarrassed in front of your sophisticated guests, and never have to worry about being disappointed."

Sole Power makes your party amazing

DJ and live music company constantly reinvents itself

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Well known as one of the top entertainment companies in Toronto, Sole Power Productions provides both entertainment services and state-of-the-art production concepts and design, making every simchah memorable.

Sole Power was founded in 2003 by owner Abby Tobias, who's been entertaining partygoers since he was just 15 years old.

"I've been doing this my whole life – I've never known anything else. I am absolutely addicted to my work, and it shows in the end product. Sole Power plays a huge role in some amazing events," said Tobias.

Sole Power currently entertains at about 1,200 events a year across Canada, with both DJs and live bands. And, for the best of both worlds – classic and contemporary tunes plus the spontaneity of a live performance – consider adding one of Sole Power's smaller bands, duos, or solo musicians to accompany any DJ.

"Live music is a great addition to an event. There's really nothing like it," Tobias said.

Tobias is proud of the reputation Sole Power has earned in the local party-planning scene.

"Everyone believes their business is the best, but the truth is, the large majority of entertainment companies are not able to provide the high-calibre shows that we can," said Tobias.

"We hire only professionals – not someone who does this kind of work on the side. I do my homework, because I have to protect my reputation, so anyone representing Sole Power will be the best there is."

Sole Power staff will work with event planners to pull the whole simchah together perfectly.

"We're involved right from the start of the planning," said Tobias. "We help with the conception of the whole party, including the schedule, colour scheme and decorations."

Additional meetings, including site visits to venue locations and discussions about budgets and personal tastes, will all help make sure that the event brings to life all the client's ideas.

One of the key features of a Sole Power event is its professional staging and lighting, which "plays a huge role in creating that dramatic atmosphere," Tobias said.

Other companies may not have the knowledge or experience to focus on these aspects of an event, he added.

Sole Power can set up its own stage at your venue and will provide show-stopping lighting. Worried that this will compromise your event's elegance? That's a misconception, said Tobias. "Proper staging and lighting turn a regular party into an amazing one."

Sole Power stays on top of current trends to make sure each event is cutting-edge.

"We are constantly reinventing what we do," said Tobias. "Anything from today will be old news in six months, so we're forced to be very creative."

Planning bar and mitzvahs keeps Tobias and his staff on their toes, since teenagers' tastes can change daily.

"In order to keep up with teenagers, my staff are following the same things as them on Twitter and reading the same blogs. We often find out the next cool topic before they do!"

For information, call 416-663-SOLE (7653) or visit solepowerproductions.com.

Mirvish Productions offers simchah solutions

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Whether you're attending a simchah and looking for a gift or hosting a simchah and looking for a venue, Mirvish Productions (416-593-0351) offers plenty of options.

Mirvish is best-known for theatre, and theatre tickets and subscriptions make excellent gifts, especially for the "person who has everything."

John Karastamatis, director of communications for Mirvish Productions, suggests that people think outside the traditional gift box. In fact, skip the box altogether: "We have so many physical goods. A theatre experience lives in your memory."

There are all kinds of theatre gift packages available, including gift certificates which never expire and are redeemable for any Mirvish shows.

They're like cash, Karastamatis says, and can even be used for productions with $29 rush seats.

The 2012-2013 season includes about 20 shows, but the two most eagerly-anticipated are Andrew Lloyd Webber's new London production of The Wizard of Oz, which opens in January, and The Book of Mormon, from the creators of the raunchy TV cartoon South Park, currently a major Broadway hit.

Karastamatis calls the Book of Mormon, "a good, old-fashioned musical that is very contemporary."

"The songs are terrific with very unusual lyrics. It's not what you'd expect to hear in a Broadway musical." That may in part be to the "salty language," he adds.

Ultimately, The Book of Mormon offers "a positive message inclusive of everyone of every faith, even those who have no faith at all." The show makes its Toronto debut in May.

Highlighting any Mirvish theatre experience are the lushly refurbished theatres themselves, which can now become unique venues for your wedding, bar or bat mitzvah, or any other type of events, says Karastamatis.

He says Mirvish's first-class theatres are even available for private events on days when there are no shows. "Our venues make fantastic party locations."

Theatres available are the Ed Mirvish Theatre (formerly the Canon Theatre) at 244 Victoria St., the Princess of Wales Theatre at 300 King St. W., the Royal Alexandra Theatre at 260 King St. W. and the Panasonic Theatre at 651 Yonge St. "Whether you are planning a concert, comedy show, seminar or wedding, we have the perfect theatre for you."

Karastamatis says rates are very affordable. "All our theatres have reception rooms that are ideal for all kinds of events. People do their own catering."

Mirvish is a full-service company expert in every facet of event planning, including production, front of house and media placement.

Some very lavish parties have been held at Mirvish theatres, he says, noting that one well-known Toronto family held a wedding on stage at the historic Ed Mirvish Theatre. Both the ceremony and the reception were all held on the stage. "It was a spectacular, one-of-a-kind event."

For more information about Mirvish Productions 2012-2013 season, or about hosting an event in a Mirvish venue, visit mirvish.com.

kippot, about a month for benschers.

• Ketubahs: Elnekave promises unbeatable prices on ketubahs from dozens of different artists, mostly from the United States and Canada, but some from Israel. "They're all customizable in terms of text options." Best of all, the original artist can fill in the names and other particulars, "so you don't have handwriting in the middle of the ketubah that doesn't match." Ketubahs require three to four weeks' lead time, but before ordering, check your selected text with the rabbi performing the marriage.

• Gifts: Guests may be calling up, asking about gifts. What can you tell them? "We have stuff for every type of occasion," says Elnekave.

"A whole range of prices, a whole range of products." With couples marrying older these days, they often already have many beautiful and practical items for the home, but still lack elegant, timeless Judaica items such as kiddush cups or menorahs.

A Hamsa, home blessing or a framed lithograph by an Israeli artist can make a special gift as well. "Our whole store is one big catalogue of wedding gifts," says Elnekave. Bar and bat mitzvahs, he says, are a little tougher: "Every kid is different." Traditional items such as a shofar or menorah might work. For others, a gift card (available in any denomination) is a safer bet. Many items, such as challah boards and kiddush cups – a classic for almost any occasion – can be personalized. There's even a registry to help guests find out what gifts would be most appreciated.

• Take-home keepsakes: Many hosts have begun including a simchah keepsake, sometimes instead of benschers.

"People give out challah covers with a custom – embroidered message on the back." There are also small engraved trinkets, such as a tiffin mirror at bar mitzvahs (similar to a women's compact). "You can put a custom-printed message on the top cover of it. Before you open it, it says on the outside, 'Bar mitzvah of so and so.'"

Benschers are popular keepsakes, with a custom message printed on the outside. Other versions are available, such as Minchah/Ma'ariv pens and Tfillat Haderet (wayfarer's prayer).

• Saying thanks: Once the simchah is over – yes, you will get there! – you'll have people to thank; people you couldn't have done it without. At Israeli Source, you can say thank you in big or small ways as your budget allows. From gift baskets to inexpensive Israeli havdalah candles, there's always something meaningful to pass along to show your appreciation.
